The dog was back next morning as the Rev. D.L. Tucker led 42 Negroes double-file from the courthouse back to church. They had gone two blocks when police cars pulled up. "All right," the dog handler yelled, "break it up and go on, or I'm going to turn him loose." As the Negroes rounded the corner, the dog bounded at Tucker. The minister fell, clutching his bitten left ankle. Two marchers crossed hands to make a seat for him and carried him off. "Sic 'em, dog!" onlookers shouted. "Let him git the niggers!"

Still the ritual procession downtown went on. Leflore was tough, and the vote workers had precious little to show: two new Negro voters on the rolls. But the harder Leflore fought, the more Negroes turned out for the nightly church rallies—and joined the daily pilgrimage to the courthouse.

'I'm Not Going Home': "The days are over when they can shoot people and burn them out, and they are gonna learn it," Bob Moses told 1,000 cheering Negroes at one church meeting. And the dog? "That dog is going to have to bite every Negro in Leflore County before we quit," the Rev. James Bevel told 2,000 more. Was the road long? "Every time a Negro stands in line and says, 'I'm tired but I'm not going home,' the walls of segregation begin to tremble," Bevel cried. "Amen," the Negroes chanted back, and they sang: "Woke up this morning with my mind on freedom, hallelujah!"

But the Negroes needed more than songs and slogans, and their leaders knew it. The channels of communication were shut down; Mayor Sampson predictably blamed "outside agitators" for the trouble in Greenwood, and he had his own prescription: "We'll just have to load up the jail." So the Negroes looked for help elsewhere—in Washington. All week they chafed as a Justice Department fact-finding team of FBI men and lawyers prowled Greenwood. Finally, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy sent an aide to seek a Federal court order requiring local officials to end "intimidation" of Negroes, free the eight prisoners—and call off the dog.

Death in the Family

Ronnie Costly was hands down the most popular of the 400 students at Wirt County High School in little Elizabeth, W.Va. Living on his grandparents' hard-scrabble farm 11 miles from town, he had to get up at 5 every morning to help with the chores and walk a mile to the school bus stop. Even so, he was a three-sport athlete and an honor student, tenth in his class; two colleges had offered him scholarships. When he ran for student-body president, he won, 10 to 1, over an opponent who had to be coaxed into the race.

So, when a fatal heart attack felled Ronnie Costly at 19 in the school locker room, it was like a death in the family for all Elizabeth. "Students were crying openly in the classrooms," principal Ray Jarvis said. "We had to call an assembly so the school chaplain could calm them." Townspeople chipped in $500 for a funeral in the school gym and 1,000 turned out—250 more than the whole town population. It was a remarkable occasion—the more so because, in an all-white high school in an all-white town, Ronnie Costly was the only Negro student.

Staff Miss

APR 6 1963

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

STEPHEN WISE CONGRESS HOUSE • 15 EAST 84TH STREET • NEW YORK 28, N.Y. • TRAFALGAR 9-4500

COMMISSION ON LAW AND SOCIAL ACTION

EPHRAIM S. LONDON, Chairman
HOWARD M. SQUADRON, Vice Chairman
ADRIAN M. UNGER, Vice Chairman

CHARLES ABRAMS
ALBERT E. ARENT
MORRIS BERICK
GERALD A. BERLIN
SAMUEL L. BRENNGLASS
JAMES M. BURNS
ROBERT K. CARR
EMANUEL CELLER
BENJAMIN V. COHEN
ROBERT E. CUSHMAN
NORMAN DORSEN
MELVIN DUBINSKY
JULIUS C. C. EDELSTEIN
ERWIN B. ELLMANN
THOMAS I. EMERSON
EDWARD J. ENNIS
IRVING JAY FAIN
DAVID FELLMAN
THOMAS K. FINLETTER
ABE FORTAS
OSMOND K. FRAENKEL
LAWRENCE H. FUCHS
HORTENSE W. GABEL
ELMER GERTZ
MARCUS GINSBURG
NATHAN GLAZER
HAROLD K. GOLDSTEIN
MURRAY A. GORDON
DONALD HARRINGTON
JEROME R. HELLERSTEIN
MARK DeWOLFE HOWE
ALFRED J. KAHN
HARRY KALVEN, JR.
MILTON R. KONVITZ
WILLIAM M. KUNSTLER
JAMES M. LANDIS
ALFRED McCLUNG LEE
A. LEO LEVIN
LOUIS E. LEVINTHAL
LEONARD W. LEVY
STANLEY H. LOWELL
JOHN A. MACKAY
ROBERT B. McKAY
BERNARD S. MEYER
BYRON S. MILLER
ROBERT R. NATHAN NATHANIEL NATHANSON
KENNETH OKA
G. BROMLEY OXNAM
ISAAC PACHT
CHARLES C. PARLIN
JUSTINE WISE POLIER
SHAD POLIER
LOUIS H. POLLAK
GEORGE POSTEL
EMANUEL RACKMAN
JOSEPH L. RAUH, JR.
NORMAN REDLICH
ARNOLD M. ROSE
EDWARD S. SILVER
TELFORD TAYLOR
JACK WASSERMAN
JACK B. WEINSTEIN
JACOB J. WEINSTEIN
LEWIS H. WEINSTEIN
RUTH G. WEINTRAUB
ALAN F. WESTIN
ROY WILKINS
A. L. WIRIN

April 4, 1963

LEO PFEFFER, Director
JOSEPH B. ROBISON, Assistant Director

Dear Colleague:

Showdown in Mississippi. Greenwood, Mississippi, population 20,436, is the county seat of Leflore County, in the heart of the Delta. The non-white population of the County makes up 64.6% of the population, but less than 1% of the voting-age Negroes are registered voters. Last August the Department of Justice brought suit to enjoin the discriminatory practices of white voting registrars. Tired of waiting for effective action by the Federal District Court, four Negro agencies united in a registration drive. They are the NAACP, CORE, Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). Their plan is to encourage registration by the use of teams of 30 to 40 persons so as to achieve a breakthrough in the fear which held back Negroes from seeking to register.

The speedup efforts of these groups, operating as the Council of Federated Organizations, immediately resulted in both unofficial and official retaliation by the white community. Last month James Travis, a Mississippian and Field Secretary for SNCC was shot. A fire was set to buildings in the Negro community in Greenwood, but was put out before it reached the one in which the SNCC office was located. This mishap was immediately righted by the burning of that building as well. The car in which a group of organizers were riding was shot up. Finally, when Negroes mobilized to march in large groups to the courthouse for the purpose of registering, Greenwood police, augmented by civilian auxiliaries, set police dogs on them and arrested a number of the marchers. All of the 11 arrested at the first demonstration were convicted of disorderly conduct and sentenced to four months in jail and fines of $200. Eight of them are still in jail.

At this point the Department of Justice stepped in again by another suit to enjoin County and City officials from harassing voter registration workers and interfering with the rights of Negroes to assemble peaceably or conduct demonstrations. The suit also seeks the release of the eight registration workers who are still in prison.

NATIONAL OFFICERS

JOACHIM PRINZ, President
SHAD POLIER, Chairman Governing Council
JULIAN FREEMAN, Co-Chairman Governing Council
SOLOMON N. PETCHERS, Treasurer
JACOB LEICHTMAN, Co-Treasurer
THEODORE J. KOLISH, Secretary
WILL MASLOW, Executive Director

Vice-Presidents:
FRANK ABRAMS, New York
PAUL G. ANNES, Chicago
WILLIAM S. COHEN, St. Louis
MAX DOFT, New York
MAX A. KOPSTEIN, Chicago
LEON KRONISH, Miami Beach
STANLEY H. LOWELL, New York
HOWARD M. METZENBAUM, Cleveland
I. H. PRINZMETAL, Beverly Hills
THELMA RICHMAN, Philadelphia
IRVING ROSENBLATT, JR., San Francisco
HARRY E. SCHACTER, New York
HOWARD M. SQUADRON, New York
GUS J. SOLOMON, Portland
LILLIAN STEINBERG, New York
SIDNEY STONEMAN, Boston
ADRIAN UNGER, New Jersey

Honorary President
ISRAEL GOLDSTEIN, Jerusalem

Honorary Vice-Presidents:
SIGMUND W. DAVID, Chicago
SIDNEY HOLLANDER, Baltimore
HORACE M. KALLEN, New York
JAMES N. ROSENBERG, New York
ISIDOR TEITELBAUM, New York

Application for a restraining order pending a hearing on the request for a preliminary injunction was made to Federal District Judge Claud Clayton, Jr. on Monday and immediately rejected by him. As a result, police have continued to arrest demonstrators and presumably the Mississippi courts will continue to convict them on charges of disorderly conduct. With a display of speed unusual for him, Judge Clayton set the request for a preliminary injunction down for formal hearing today. His record for procrastination in other civil rights cases leaves no doubt, however, that such promptness in granting a hearing in the present suit was due to an awareness on the part of Judge Clayton that, otherwise, the Department of Justice would "go over his head" and apply to the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit for a restraining order. He was obviously mindful of the fact that this course of action was followed by the Department of Justice last October when another diehard segregationist, District Judge William H. Cox, refused to enjoin the prosecution of John Hardy, a leader in the campaign for Negro registration.

On September 7, when Mr. Hardy brought two Negroes into the office to register, the white registrar hit him on the head with a gun and the sheriff immediately arrested him on the charge of breach of the peace. The Justice Department promptly appealed to Judge Cox, who had been newly appointed by President Kennedy, to enjoin the prosecution. When this application was refused, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit forthwith granted a temporary restraining order pending a full trial at which the Justice Department would have the opportunity to offer proof to sustain its charge that the State criminal proceedings were being used to prevent Negro registration. The 2-to-1 decision of the Court of Appeals was made by Judge Richard T. Rives of Alabama and Judge John R. Brown of Texas. Judge Ben F. Cameron of Mississippi dissented. The Supreme Court of the United States refused to grant review.

The record of Judge Clayton, an Eisenhower appointee, does not provide any reason to expect that he will grant the relief sought by the Department of Justice. Indeed, probably the best that can be hoped for is that Judge Clayton will grant a full hearing and hand down an early decision which can then be presented to the Court of Appeals for review.

Two cases will, I believe, indicate Judge Clayton's hostility to civil rights. In Noelle Henry v. The Coahoma County Board of Education, a complaint, along with a motion for preliminary injunction, was filed in October, 1962, alleging that the plaintiff, a Negro school teacher, had been refused a teaching contract for the current school year in reprisal for her membership in the NAACP and her activities, and the activities of her husband, in the civil rights field. The motion for preliminary injunction has not yet been set for a hearing, notwithstanding several letters from plaintiff's counsel requesting that this be done. Early responses from Judge Clayton were based on the fact that certain members of the defendant School Board named in the complaint had resigned and it was the Judge's contention that the suit should not be heard until this problem was corrected. An order dropping the former Board members and naming the newly added members was signed on February 15, 1963, but Judge Clayton has even since claimed that his busy calendar will not permit hearing.

Judge Clayton displayed no greater wish to expedite matters even in a suit brought to end the obviously unconstitutional practice of racial segregation in Mississippi travel facilities. In that case, Bailey v Patterson, suit was filed on June 9, 1961 seeking injunctive relief against the State of Mississippi, the City of Jackson, and various common carriers. Because a State segregation law [illegible]

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Judge District Court was convened. It consisted of Court of Appeals Chief Judge Elbert Paul Tuttle of Atlanta, Georgia and District Judge Sidney Mize and Judge Clayton, both of whom are Mississippians. (It was Judge Mize who, in another case, repeatedly refused to order the University of Mississippi to admit James Meredith and was reversed by the Court of Appeals.)

A motion for preliminary injunction was set for July 10, 1961, at which time Judge Clayton and Judge Mize, over the strenuous objection of Chief Judge Tuttle, voted to grant a motion for a continuance until August 7, 1961, based on the alleged illness of the State's Chief Counsel. A hearing on the case in September, 1961, resulted in a 2-to-1 decision on November 17, 1961 in which Judge Clayton joined with Judge Mize in voting to deny plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief on the basis of the doctrine of abstention, i.e., that the Federal Courts should withhold relief until the case had been carried through the State judicial system. Circuit Judge Rives of Alabama wrote a strong dissenting opinion. The majority's decision was summarily reversed, on February 26, 1962, by the United States Supreme Court in a per curiam opinion.

At his press conference yesterday, President Kennedy said, "I would hope that the court would find that there has been a denial of rights which seems to me evident but which the court must decise"...The Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted thereunder -- in this case, the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1958, to protect the rights of Negroes to register and vote -- are the "supreme law of the land." However, one cannot expect that supremacy to be upheld by the appointment of United States District Judges who are hostile to such legislation and to the guarnatees of equal protection of the laws promised by the Fourteenth Amendment.

"Bull" Connor Defeated. Yesterday former Alabama Lt. Gov. Albert Boutwelle, a soft-spoken segregationist, was named Mayor of Birmingham in a run-off election in which the total vote of 51,378 was a record high for a city election in the State's most populous city. Mr. Boutwelle received 29,630 votes to 21,648 for City Commissioner Eugene ("Bull") Connor. The winning margin was certainly accounted for in large part by the 8,000 Negroes who were among the 68,000 registered voters. They had good cause to vote solidly against Connor since he has long been notorious, locally and nationally, for his ruthless enforcement of segregation. The fear in which Bull Connor has been held is attested by the fact that even white Christian ministers have been afraid to meet with Negro clergymen for fear of being arrested for violation of a Birmingham ordinance forbidding mixed meetings. It is, of course, a sad reflection upon the courage of the white ministers that they were unwilling to risk arrest and thereby challenge what is clearly an unconstitutional local law.

The Whipping Post and the Constitution. Yesterday the Delaware Supreme Court unanimously rejected the appeal by Franklin W. Cannon from a sentence of 20 lashes as a probation violator. The sentence requires that the whipping be inflicted "publicly by strokes on the bare back well laid on." Cannon contended that such a whipping constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment" prohibited by the Eighth Amendment and made applicable to the States by Due Process of Law Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Originally Cannon, who had a record of juvenile arrest, was sentenced to 20 lashes for automobile theft, and placed on probation. When he was arrested several months later and charged with larceny, the whipping sentence was reimposed.

Delaware is the only State which continues to allow whipping of criminals. Its statute goes back 246 years and, no doubt, this form of punishment was once generally prevalent in the United States. In my opinion, however, in this day and age it so offends the respect for human personality that it will be held unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court and it is my hope that the case will go to that Court.

Amicus Curiae And The Supreme Court. The March issue of the Yale Law Journal carries an article, "The Amicus Curiae Brief: From Friendship to Advocacy." by Professor Samuel Krislov, of the Department of Political Science at Michigan State University. It traces the evolution of briefs submitted as a "friend of the court." In the course of the article, Prof. Krislov notes that: "An increased reliance on litigation as a means of vindicating minority rights otherwise difficult to obtain through the political process, however, resulted in civil rights organizations such as the ACLU, and the American Jewish Congress, being among the most active filers of amicus curiae briefs over the past few years."

At another point in the article, Prof. Krislov observes that: "Some amicus curiae briefs have, of course, been of great legal guidance to the Court...Mr. Justice Frankfurter relied greatly upon the Synagogue Council of America brief in the McCollum case, for example..."

In McCollum, the Supreme Court held unconstitutional the conduct of released time for religious classes in public school buildings during the school day. Actually the brief referred to by Prof. Krislov was submitted not only on behalf of the Synagogue Council - comprising the Rabbinical and Synagogue organizations of the Reform, Conservative and Orthodox groups - but also the National Community Relations Advisory Council, a co-ordinating body of national Jewish organizations and the local community relations organizations. The brief in that case was prepared by Leo Pfeffer, National Director of the Commission on Law and Social Action of AJCongress.

It is interesting to note that Chief Justice Warren made reference last month to another brief prepared by Leo Pfeffer for the Synagogue Council. and the NCRAC. This occurred during the argument of the Maryland and Pennsylvania Bible reading cases. The Attorney General of Pennsylvania had just stated that the opposition to these practices stems from persons who were seeking to further atheism. The Chief Justice called his attention to the fact that the Court had received a brief submitted on behalf of the Synagogue Council of America. Needless to say, the Attorney General dropped his argument on this point like a "hot potato."

The Right of Conscience And The Obligation of Jury Service. On March 8 the Supreme Court of Minnesota unanimously upheld the contempt conviction of a woman who had refused to serve on a jury because of her belief that such conduct violated the Biblical admonition, "Judge not so that you will not be judged." The Court rejected the contention that compulsory jury service constituted a denial of religious freedom guaranteed by the State and Federal Constitutions. Justice Otis said: "The likelihood of this [woman's] conscience being unduly burdened by service on a jury is slight compared to the sense of guilt which might well afflict a conscientious objector who may be required to kill another human being in time of war without any constitutional right o exemption." Whatever the power of Congress to require a person to serve as a combatant, the fact is that our draft laws have consistently granted such persons exemption on grounds of religious beliefs. Moreover, it verges, in my opinion, upon the absurd, to analogize the obligation of jury service with the obligation to defend one's country. It is fantastic to urge, as did the Minnesota Supreme Court, that to allow exemption from jury service because of religious principles, "is to invite erosion of every other obligation a citizen owes his community and his country."

Sincerely yours,

Leo Pfeffer

Leo Pfeffer

file before

2nd Dist. Phila 36 x % to white strong dem. pat. age.

Pick up the ball in other ventures that the Federal Government has invited them to help with. Billboard control is an example. In the 5 years since the Federal act was passed, only 17 States, again including Pennsylvania, have qualified to participate and earn bonus payments.

Deprive central government of its growing role by acting themselves to meet such urgent social problems as housing, education, civil rights. Pioneering in these fields has been left to Uncle Sam.

Talk is cheap. Only legislative deeds count in the effort to keep Government close to home. State legislatures that abdicate their responsibilities are ill qualified to complain about Federal fulfillment of vaccums they ignored.

Suff. Miss.

Action Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT N. C. NIX

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 4, 1963

Mr. NIX. Mr. Speaker, the time is now for immediate and drastic executive action, for accelerated legal procedures by the Attorney General, for positive congressional action to strengthen and extend the law by giving to the Attorney General the legal authority to protect the rights of the Negroes of Mississippi, as well as the rights of minorities everywhere in the United States, to the limit.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to solicit the aid of every Member of the Congress of the United States to join me now in protesting and denouncing the illegal actions on the part of the authorities of Mississippi and elsewhere insofar as the actions of those authorities in anyway hamper the constitutional rights of Negro citizens.

I call the attention of my colleagues to a long series of outrages suffered by Negroes of Mississippi and I emphatically state that these crimes cry out for positive and courageous action, not tomorrow, but now.

CHRONOOGY OF VIOLENCE AND INTIMIDATION IN MISSISSIPPI SINCE 1961

1961

January 1, Greenville, Washington County: Two young white men rode a motorbike through a residential area and, according to the local police chief, fired a volley of shots into a group of Negroes. George Mayfield, 18, was seriously wounded in both legs; Percy Lee Simmons, 19, was shot in the right leg.

March 30, Jackson, Hinds County: Club-swinging police and 2 police dogs chased more than 100 Negroes from a courthouse where 9 Negro students were convicted for staging a sitin demonstration. Several were struck by the clubs and at least one person was bitten by the dogs.

May 7, Jackson, Hinds County: Several white youths, riding in an open convertible, lassoed 9-year-old Negro Gloria Laverne Floyd with a wire and dragged her along the street. The girl suffered a deep gash in her head that required three stitches, cheek bruises, a laceration of her right shoulder, and burn marks on her neck. Police made arrests.

August 15, Amite County: Robert Moses, Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee—SNCC—registration worker, and three Negroes who had tried unsuccessfully to register in Liberty, were driving toward McComb when a county officer stopped them. He asked if Moses was the man "who's been trying to register our niggers." All were taken to court and Moses was arrested for "impeding an officer in the discharge of his duties," fined $50 and spent 2 days in jail.

August 22, Amite County: Robert Moses went to Liberty with three Negroes, who made an unsuccessful attempt to register. A block from the courthouse, Moses was attacked and beaten by Billy Jack Caston, the sheriff's first cousin. Eight stitches were required to close a wound in Moses' head. Caston was acquitted of assault charges by an all-white jury before a justice of the peace.

August 26, McComb, Pike County: Hollis Watkins, 20, and Elmer Hayes, 20, SNCC workers, were arrested while staging a sit-in at the F. W. Woolworth store and charged with breach of the peace. They spent 36 days in jail.

August 27 and 29, McComb, Pike County: Five Negro students from a local high school were convicted of breach of the peace following a sit-in at a variety store and bus terminal. They were sentenced to a $400 fine each and 8 months in jail. One of these students, a girl of 15, was turned over to juvenile authorities, released, subsequently rearrested, and sentenced to 12 months in a State school for delinquents.

August 29, McComb, Pike County: Two Negro leaders were arrested in McComb as an aftermath of the sit-in protest march on city hall, charged with contributing to the delinquency of minors. They were Curtis C. Bryant, of McComb, an official of the NAACP, and Cordelle Reagan, of SNCC. Each arrest was made on an affidavit signed by Police Chief George Guy, who said he had information that the two "were behind some of this racial trouble."

August 30, McComb, Pike County: SNCC Workers Brenda Travis, 16, Robert Talbert, 19, and Isaac Lewis, 20, staged a sit-in in the McComb terminal of the Greyhound buslines. They were arrested on charges of breach of the peace and failure to obey a policeman's order to move on. They spent 30 days in jail.

September 5, Liberty, Amite County: Travis Britt, SNCC registration worker, was attacked and beaten by whites on the courthouse lawn. Britt was accompanied at the time by Robert Moses. Britt said one man hit him more than 20 times. The attackers drove away in a truck.

September 7, Tylertown, Walthall County: John Hardy, SNCC registration worker, took two Negroes to the county courthouse to register. The registrar told them he "wasn't registering voters" that day. When the three turned to leave, Registrar John Q. Wood took a pistol from his desk and struck Hardy over the head from behind. Hardy was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace.

September 13, Jackson, Hinds County: 15 Episcopal ministers—among them three Negroes—were arrested for asking to be served at the lunch counter of the Greyhound bus terminal. They were charged with inviting a breach of the peace. They were found not guilty of the charge on May 21, 1962, by County Judge Russell Moore.

September 25, Liberty, Amite County: Herbert Lee, a Negro who had been active in voter registration, was shot and killed by white State representative E. H. Hurst in downtown Liberty. No prosecution was undertaken, the authorities explaining that the representative had shot in self-defense.

October 4, McComb, Pike County: The five students who were arrested as a result of the August 29 sit-in in McComb returned to school, but were refused admittance. At that, 116 students walked out and paraded downtown to the city hall in protest. Police arrested the entire crowd, but later released all but 19, all of whom were 18 years old or older. They were charged with breach of the peace and contributing to the delinquency of minors and allowed to go free on bail totaling $3,700. At the trial on October 31, Judge Brumfield, finding the students guilty, and sentencing each to a $500 fine and 6 months in jaid, said:

Some of you are local residents, some of you are outsiders. Those of you who are local residents are like sheep being led to the slaughter. If you continue to follow the advice of outside agitators, you will be like sheep and be slaughtered.

October 5, McComb, Pike County: Charles Sherrod was arrested on the street, thrown into a police car, and charged with resisting arrest. Cordelle Reagan was also arrested and charged with contributing to the delinquency of a minor. Both were fieldworkers for SNCC.

October 11, McComb, Pike County: Paul Potter of Philadelphia, a vice president of the National Student Association, and Tom Hayden of Atlanta, both white, were dragged from their car and beaten as they drove alongside a group of Negroes making an antisegregation march. When the two slowed their car for a traffic light, a heavy-set white man opened the door and dragged the driver out and hit him several times. He then walked around to the other side of the car, opened the door and knocked the second man to the street. The incident occurred in the business section of the city.

October 13, McComb, Pike County: Police Officer B. F. Elmore shot and killed a Negro motorist. Police Chief George Guy said that Elmore said he had stopped Eli Brumfield at 4 a.m. for speeding. Brumfield allegedly jumped from his car with a pocket knife in his hand and attacked Elmore. A coroner's jury ruled Elmore fired in self-defense.

October 22, Jackson, Hinds County: Dion Diamond, a SNCC worker, was arrested for "running a stop sign" after being followed all day. In court the next day, the arresting officer told the judge:

"He is a Freedom Rider. Throw the book at him."

Diamond was refused legal counsel and fined $168.

November 9, McComb, Pike County: Jerome Smith, 22, Congress of Racial Equality—CORE—field man, and four companions, Dorothy Smith, 18; Alice Thompson, 22; Thomas Valentine, 23; and George Raymond, 18, were attacked by a mob of 30 to 40 whites when they sought service at the lunch counter of the Greyhound bus terminal in McComb. Smith, who suffered head injuries when he was slugged with brass knuckles during the attack, said FBI agents were present at the time of the attack, but did "nothing but take notes" while the mob kicked and beat his companions. The victims were rescued from the mob by a Negro truck driver and Negro cab drivers.

November 10, Jackson, Hinds County: Jessie Divens, 12-year-old, was arrested for refusing to move to the rear of a city bus. Judge Carl Guernsey released the girl to the custody of Rev. G. R. Horton, chaplain of Campbell College where she attended classes. Judge Guernsey continued the case until November 17:

With the understanding that the Reverend Mr. Horton and the child come back with a workable plan which would cause the child's mind to be concerned with education rather than social reformation.

November 18, McComb, Pike County: Persons unknown fired a shotgun blast into the bedroom of Dion Diamond and John Hardy at 702 Wall Street. Investigating officer Frank Williams found shotgun pellets embedded in the window frame.

December 1, McComb, Pike County: Four white men attacked three newsmen on the street, sending one crashing into a plate glass window of a store. The newsmen were Tom Uhrborck and Don Underwood, Life magazine, and Simmons Fentress, Time magazine.

December 2, McComb, Pike County: Police broke up an attempt by white attackers to drag three Freedom Riders from an automobile at the Greyhound bus terminal. Four men kicked at the locked car and beat upon the windows in an attempt to reach the young Negroes and their driver, Thomas Gaither, field secretary of CORE. The police, who were standing by when the riders arrived aboard a bus from Jackson, pulled the men away from the car, but made no arrests.

December 26, Jackson, Hinds County: Rafford Johnson, Negro, was severely beaten by two law officers after being involved in a minor collision with a car driven by a white woman. Johnson underwent surgery for skull injuries.

1962

February 6, 1962, Clarksdale, Coahoma County: Miss Bessie Turner, 19, a Negro, was walking with a young man down a Clarksdale street when Clarksdale police officers stopped them and accused Miss Turner of having been involved in a theft. Miss Turner said the officers took her to the jail, forced her to undressed and to lie on her back. The officers [illegible] other officer beat her across her naked breasts. Miss Turner filed Federal charges against the officers.

March 15, 1962, Shelby, Bolivar County: Aaron Henry, State president of the NAACP, was convicted in Justice of Peace court on charges of making perverse advances on a white teenage hitchhiker. Henry stated that the charges were a complete fabrication, and presented an alibi supported by sworn witnesses. The conviction has been appealed. When he later stated in a press conference that the prosecutor and the police chief, who figured in the trial, had conspired to frame him, Henry was sued by the two for defamation. A Mississippi white jury awarded the prosecutor $25,000 and the police chief $15,000.

April 12, 1962, Taylorsville, Smith County: Cpl. Roman Ducksworth, Jr., U.S. Army, a Negro, was shot and killed by Policeman Bill Kelly, when, according to an NAACP news release, Duckworth "insisted on his right to sit where he chose on an interstate bus." Policeman Kelly claimed that Ducksworth was drunk and started fighting. No charges were brought against Kelly. Ducksworth was en route from Camp Ritchie, Md., to see his wife who was ill in a Laurel, Miss., hospital.

April 1962, Lucedale, George County: Mrs. Ernestine Denham Talbert, who lives in George County but teaches in Green County, was notified by the Green County School Board that her teaching contract would not be renewed. Mrs. Talbert had tried in January to register to vote but had been refused.

May 17, 1962, Rankin County: The Negro editor, of the Mississippi Free Press, said he and a companion were beaten by Rankin County officers and a highway patrolman. Lawrence Hudson, Jr., of Jackson, said the beating occurred after he was stopped en route from Jackson to Forest to check on a rumor that a Negro man had been killed by a white man. He was jailed, refused permission to phone a lawyer, tried the next day on several charges and fined $151.

June 21, 1962, Clarksdale, Coahoma County: A white lawyer from Jackson and four college students were jailed in Clarksdale for 20 hours without outside communication. One of the students was a Negro. William Higgs, the lawyer, and the students were jailed on a Sunday night by county officers and were released the following day, without charges being filed against them.

July 5, 1962, Jackson, Hinds County: Jesse Harris, 20, and Luvaghn Brown, 17, SNCC workers, charged that they were beaten and threatened with death while serving a 30-day sentence in the county jail for contempt of court. The young Negroes had refused to move from a court bench customarily occupied by whites while they were attending the trial of Mrs. Diane Nash Bevel. The young men said that, in the courthouse elevator, a deputy sheriff called Harris "a damned nigger" and beat him about the head with his fist. At the county farm they were placed in an isolation [illegible] beaten by a guard named Keith while other prisoners held him. Keith beat him across the back with a length of hose threatening:

Nigger, I'll kill you.

August 16, 1962, Greenwood, Leflore County: Samuel Block, 23, SNCC field secretary, said three white men accosted him in a parking lot and "started beating me with their fists." He said they threatened him and then beat him for about 5 minutes.

There is no use reporting it to local authorities—

He said.

August 17, 1962, Greenwood, Leflore County: SNCC workers Samuel Block, Luvaghn Brown, and Lawrence Guyot were forced to flee from the second story window of their voter registration office. They said armed white men invaded the premises intent upon doing them harm.

August 17, 1962, Ruleville, Sunflower County: Mayor Charles Durrough asked Mr. Lenard Davis, a Negro employed by the city, what he knew about the registration school being conducted at a Negro church. Mr. Davis replied that he did not know anything at all about the school, and did not attend any of the classes. The mayor then told him that he, the mayor, knew what kind of school they were having. The mayor said he knew it—presumably, civil rights for the Negro—was coming, and he was not going to allow it to be forced on them. The mayor said that anyone attending the school would be given a one-way ticket out of town, and if that would not do it, they would use whatever they had available. See entry below for September 3, 1962.

August 1962, Greenwood, Leflore County: Welton McSwine, Jr., 14-year-old Negro, was arrested by police after a white woman's house had been broken into. When police got the youth to the station an officer said:

All right, nigger, you know why you are here, and we want to know who broke into that white woman's house.

McSwine told them he knew nothing of the incident, saying that he spent all his time in the cottonfield, and suggesting that his mother could corroborate this. McSwine said officers then took him to a cell and beat him, first hitting him in the head with a blackjack; then one of the policemen beat him in the face with his fist while another hit him in the stomach with his club; then the officers made him lie naked on the floor on his side while they beat him with a whip. McSwine was released after intercession of his father's white employer.

August 21, 1962, Liberty, Amite County: Sam Wells and Tommy Weathersby went to the courthouse to register. While they were waiting to get into the registrar's office, they stood on the front porch of the courthouse. Deputy Sheriff Daniel Jones told them:

Get your ——— off the front porch, and don't come back in.

[illegible] Wells got off the [illegible] A few minutes later, [illegible]

[illegible] Dewey Greene, Jr., Mississippi Free Press reporter, was taking pictures of Negroes waiting to register at the courthouse. An unidentified young man working in the office down the hall from the registrar's office snatched Greene's camera away, and refused to return it. Greene was told to leave town by three white men, one of whom was flourishing a length of lead pipe. He left.

August 29, 1962, Clarksdale, Coahoma County: Seven Negroes were arrested after attending a voter registration meeting. David Dennis, CORE field secretary, was charged with failure to yield right-of-way after a police officer had forced him to submit to a long harangue of threats and abuse. Samuel Block, John Hodges, J. L. Harris, Richard T. Gray, and Albert Garrer, SNCC field workers, and Dewey Greene, Jr., reporter for the Mississippi Free Press, were forced by Clarksdale police to alight from their car, and were charged with loitering in violation of the city curfew.

August 30, 1962, Indianola, Sunflower County: SNCC workers C. R. McLauren, Albert Garner, J. O. Hodges, Samuel Block, and Robert Moses were arrested by Indianola police on a charge of distributing literature without a permit. The registration workers had been taking leaflets announcing a registration mass meeting door-to-door in the Negro community. Lafayette Surney, 17, another SNCC worker, was arrested and then released to Rev. James Bevel, of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference—SCLC.

August 31, Indianola, Sunflower County: During the trial of Samuel Block on charges of distributing literature without a permit, the Municipal Judge informed Block that he could cross-examine the arresting officer. Block asked the officer:

Did you actually see me hand out a leaflet?

The judge turned to the officer and said:

He can ask you anything he wants to, but you don't have to answer.

The judge told Lafayette Surney if he was caught in Indianola agitating again, he would be sent to the penal farm.

September 3, 1962, Ruleville, Sunflower County: Because of registration activity, two Negro-owned dry cleaning establishments were closed—allegedly for violating city ordinances.

September 3, 1962, Ruleville, Sunflower County: Lenard Davis, 49, sanitation department worker, was told by Mayor Charles M. Durrough:

We're going to let you go. Your wife's been attending that school.

He referred to a registration school conducted by SNCC workers in Ruleville.

September 3, 1962, Ruleville, Sunflower County: Fred Hicks, 40, who drove field-workers to the plantations, was told he could no longer use a bus without a commercial license. Hicks said the bus owner told him that, because Hicks' mother had registered to vote:

We gonna see how tight we can make it—gonna make it just as tight as we can.

[illegible] Sunflower County, Hicks and Aaron Moore, a local Negro leader, were walking down the street. A white man in a pickup truck drew up alongside and asked if they were the "folks getting the people to register." Moses and Moore answered yes, they were. The man asked if they could come out to his plantation to register people. The two answered, yes, they could come. The man said then:

I've got a shotgun waiting for you, double barrel.

September 3, Ruleville, Sunflower County: A letter from Mayor Durrough notified the Williams Chapel Missionary Baptist Church that tax exemption and free water were being cut off because the property was being used for "purposes other than worship services." The church was a meeting place for voter registration workers.

September 10, Ruleville, Sunflower County: Marylene Burkes, 20, and Vivian Hillet, 19, were severely wounded when an unidentified assailant fired through the window of Miss Hillet's grandparents' home. The grandparents had been active in voter registration work.

October 3, Biloxi, Harrison County: A Negro frame residence and a gasoline station were targets for two "Molotov cocktails" which caused more than $4,000 damage. One of the bombs struck the home of Dr. Gilbert Mason, a Negro physician, who is active in integration efforts. The other crashed through the window of a service station operated by Emmett Clark, a Negro.

October 5, Harmony, Leake County: Night riders fired shotguns into eight Negro homes and a Negro store. An elderly Negro said he was struck in the knee by a squirrel shot while he and his 9-year-old grandson were sleeping. He said he was not seriously hurt. Harmony Negroes had recently petitioned authorities for school desegregation.

October 10, Columbus, Lowndes County: A "Molotov cocktail" was tossed from a speeding car into the home of Dr. James L. Allen of Columbus, vice chairman of the Mississippi Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

October 29, Clarksdale, Coahoma County: Charles McLaurin, SNCC registration worker, was stopped by police as he was walking a group home from the courthouse. The group had tried to register to vote. The officer asked to see McLaurin's driver's license. McLaurin showed it. The officer asked McLaurin what he was doing there. McLaurin told him he worked in voter registration. Then, accompanied by obscene remarks, the officer said:

Nigger, do you know the way out of town?

McLaurin replied:

Yes.

The officer said, with more obscenity:

Nigger. Can't you say "Yes, sir?"

The officer's partner asked the officer what charge should be put on the tickets.

[illegible] McLaurin replied:

No.

The officer said:

Then you're going to jail.

At the jail, McLaurin learned that the officer was Clarksdale Police Chief Ben Collins. McLaurin was in jail a few minutes when his companions posted bond for him in the amount of $103. They decided to forfeit bond rather than run the risk of a higher fine or incur the legal expense of an appeal.

October 31, Jackson, Hinds County: Thomas E. Johnson, a white minister, and a member of the Mississippi Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commisison on Civil Rights, saw a group of neighbors dumping garbage on his lawn. Johnson had just returned from taking his car to a safe place because of threats by neighbors to damage it. Johnson sought a peace bond against the man whom he had observed leading the garbage-dumping operations of his neighbors. The man presented 11 witnesses who swore that he had been in their presence at all times on the evening in question. The justice of the peace accepted their testimony and refused the bond. Then the Hinds County Grand Jury indicted Johnson and his wife on perjury charges, because of their testimony at the peace bond hearing.

November 6, 1962, Greenville, Washington County: Two WAF's and two airmen—all white—from the Greenville Air Force Base were fined $55 and given 30-day suspended sentences on charges of creating a disturbance by entering a restaurant and seeking service with two Negro voter registration workers.

December 26, 1962, Clarksdale, Coahoma County: Ivanhoe Donaldson and Benjamin Taylor, students from Detroit, brought a truckload of food, clothing and medicines for distribution to the Delta's needy families who had been cut off from Federal surplus commodities. The medicines had been donated by a physician in Louisville, and were consigned to Aaron Henry, a licensed pharmacist. They were arrested by Clarksdale police and held for investigation. After police searched the truck on December 27, and found what they described as a drug used to ease the pain of middle-aged women, Donaldson and Taylor were charged with possession of narcotics and bond was set at $15,000. Bond was later reduced to $1,500.

1963

January 17, Canton, Madison County: The castrated and mutilated body of Sylvester Maxwell, 24-year-old Negro, was found by his brother-in-law less than 500 yards from the home of a white family. Mississippi NAACP Field Secretary Medger Evers termed the slaying a "probable lynching."

February 2, Greenwood, Leflore County: Willie Peacock, SNCC registration worker, complained to the Justice Department that officials had refused to register him on two occasions, and had rejected his poll tax payment for this year.

February 20, Greenwood, Leflore County: Four Negro businesses on the same street as the SNCC voter registration office were burned to the ground. Mrs. Nancy Brand, a worker in the SNCC office, reported an anonymous telephone call in which a man's voice asked her if she ever came to the office. When she said "yes", the voice said:

You won't be going down there anymore, that's been taken care of.

The burned businesses were Jackson's Garage, George's Cafe, Porter's Pressing Shop, and the Esquire Club. The pressing shop is next door to the SNCC office, and SNCC workers believed the businesses were burned by mistake. Sam Block, SNCC field secretary, was arrested 2 days later for suggesting there was some connection between the burnings and the registration efforts of SNCC. He was charged with circulating statements calculated to create a breach of the peace.

February 28, Greenwood, Leflore County: Three registration workers were attacked with gunfire on U.S. Highway 82 just outside Greenwood. The shots were fired from a 1962 white Buick. The car in which the workers were riding was punctured by 11 bullets. One worker, James Travis of SNCC, was wounded in the neck and shoulder.

March 4, Clarksdale, Coahoma County: The show windows in the Fourth Street drugstore were smashed, as they have been several times in the past. The proprietor of the store, Aaron Henry, found the damage when he returned from speaking at a mass meeting in Leflore County in connection with the voter registration drive there.

March 6, Greenwood, Leflore County: Samuel Block and three others were fired on from a station wagon which pulled up beside their car as they were parked in front of the SNCC voter registration office. Both front windows were shattered. Police later found the wadding from a shotgun shell buried in the headliner of Block's car, and several pellets in the wall of the building in front of which the car had been parked.

March 12, Greenwood, Leflore County: A 12-year-old Negro girl was attacked by an egg-throwing truckload of white teenaged boys. The girl suffered facial bruises.

March 20, 1963, Jackson, Hinds County: Three shots were fired through the windshield of a car belonging to Mrs. Mattie Dennis while it was parked in front of the home of Mrs. Dennis' cousin, whom she was visiting. Mrs. Dennis is the wife of David Dennis, CORE field secretary for Mississippi. Both have been active in voter registration.

March 24, 1963, Greenwood, Leflore County: Fire destroyed partially the interior of the voter registration office at 115 East McLeurin Street, making the office unusable and necessitating a search for new headquarters. Witnesses said they saw two white men fleeing the scene shortly before the fire was discovered.

March 24, 1963, Greenwood, Leflore County: A shotgun blast ripped into the home of Dewey Greene, Sr., father of the latest Negro applicant to the University of Mississippi. Another of Mr. Greene's sons and a daughter have been active in the Leflore County registration project. Greenwood police said they were investigating.

March 27, 1963, Greenwood, Leflore County: James Forman, executive secretary of SNCC, Bob Moses, and about 10 other registration workers were arrested and taken from a group en route to the courthouse to register after the police dispersed a group of more than 100 Negroes with the use of police dogs.

---

A Voluntary Medical Care Plan for the Elderly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. HARSHA

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 4, 1963

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues, the gentleman from Ohio, FRANK BOW, has had the foresight to present to this Congress a constructive program dealing with the problem of providing adequate medical care for our elderly citizens. The Bow bill is a progressive approach to the problem, meeting it head on and provides the care required by the free enterprise approach without the stigma of socialized medicine. On April 1, 1963, my distinguished colleague presented his program to the American Academy of General Practice at Chicago, Ill. In this speech he explains the merits of his bill and I am happy to include his speech in my remarks:

A VOLUNTARY MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM FOR THE ELDERLY

(Address of Representative FRANK T. BOW, of Ohio, before the American Academy of General Practice, at Chicago, Ill., April 1, 1963)

In his invitation to me, Dr. Rhoades suggested that I might be considered the middle-of-the-road member of this panel. Perhaps that is a fair description, because in almost every aspect of political philosophy I am certain I stand far to the right of Secretary Nestingen, and with respect to medical care for the elderly, I am certainly to the left of those who want to stand pat on the present laws or programs in this field.

Insofar as the provisions of my own legislation are concerned, I am neither left nor right of them but far out in front for I propose to do more and do it better than either of them.

As I said to some of you in Detroit a few weeks ago, you are entitled to an explanation of why FRANK BOW, a conservative member of the House Appropriations Committee, is here at all, for it is most unusual to find such a man sponsoring something drastically new in the field of social legislation.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF HEALTH CARE

Let me say, first, that I have been concerned by efforts to federalize—or nationalize or socialize, you can choose your own term—the health care of this Nation for many years. My interest was stimulated 10 years ago when I became the counsel of the Harness Committee, a congressional committee investigating the lobbying activities of Federal agencies. One of the worst offenders that era was the Federal Security Age predecessor of the Department of Hea Education, and Welfare. Oscar Ewing, C of the Agency, was engaged in a widesp lobbying campaign to place the Federal G ernment in control of all health service the United States and guarantee cradle the-grave security for every American, object of his affections was the old Wag Murray-Dingell bill. His principal ag who has now returned to Government close associate of my fellow panelist, Assistant Secretary Wilbur Cohen.

The Forand bill of several years ago, King-Anderson bill of the 87th Congress, the present Kennedy bill are the direct scendants of the Wagner-Murray-Din measure.

When it was discovered that Americ were not ready to accept Government c trol of all medicine, and compulsory hea insurance for everyone, the approach modified in the Forand bill to include eve one who receives social security bene And when the American people refused buy that package, it was further modifie include only people over 65 who are cove by social security.

Each step of the way Mr. Forand and other sponsors of the legislation assured t supporters that the retreat was tempor They say that if we can get hospitalizat for the aged under social security, we can the next Congress to add doctor bills house calls, and the next Congress to widows and orphans, and so on, year by y until we will cover everyone for every hea need by a compulsory tax. That would b sad day for the American people, for a have often said, government medicine is good medicine.

ELDERLY NEED PROTECTION

However, I find merit in the proposal provide a special program to help reti men and women meet the cost of medi care. I am convinced that this is a seri problem and one that deserves the attenti of the Federal Government. It is a probl because people who retire must live on duced income, sometimes greatly redue They often lose the group health insura benefits that protected them during th years of active work or, if they can afford they can continue the protection at hig individual rates. However, sadly enough, w many of our retirees cannot afford to p the premiums necessary to obtain adequ protection.

Most of these people can get along inso as the customary expenses of a modest even frugal living are concerned. Their di culty arises when they are confronted wi an unusually large extra expense, such as th of a severe illness, and they simply cann meet such additional expenses on retireme income.

As members of the medical profession, y know far better than I some of the hardsh that older people encounter.

The administration proposal as present advanced does not solve the problem. T Kerr-Mills law does not solve it, for the people are not medical indigents. They b come so only after severe illness wipes o their resources.

It seemed to me that someone must devel a better plan than King-Anderson or Ke Mills, and that it should be a plan embod ing these fundamentals:

1. It should be voluntary.

2. It should provide generous coverage take care of major medical expenses, to t maximum possible extent.

3. It should avoid establishing a new Fe eral bureaucracy.

4. It should avoid Federal control or i terference in health care.

5. It should cover everyone who cannot a ford to take care of himself.

NY Times, 4/28/63 Suff Miss.

PA, ML, WB, JS, JSC

During a Negro voter registration drive in Greenwood, Miss., police attempt to disperse marchers.

Inquiry Into the Mississippi Mind

Racial conflict has made this Southern state the symbol of uncompromising resistance to change. Herewith, an examination of Mississippi's plight, the causes and the outlook.

By CLAUDE SITTON

JACKSON, Miss.

WHEN Mississippi Negroes gather to discuss their struggle for equality, as they frequently do, one story they tell concerns a plantation field hand named John. Seized by civil rights fever, he pays a visit to the big house to proclaim the new order.

"Mister Charlie," he says to the white planter, "all these years you and Miss Ann has called me 'John.' That's all right. But things is changed. There ain't gonna be no more 'Mister Charlie' and 'Miss Ann.' It's just 'Ann' and 'Charlie' now. And, Charlie, one other thing: Ain't gonna be no more Mississippi, either. From now on, it's just 'Sippi.' "

Mississippi whites see little humor in the story. Mister Charlie and Miss Ann quickly lose the graciousness and warmth with which they are rightfully credited if one suggests that racial customs must be modified. They know that change is inevitable. But the mind boggles at the thought—and sometimes slips its moorings to reality.

This irrational reaction partially explains some of the shocking events of the past year: The bloody riots over a Negro's admission to the University of Mississippi, the continued denial of minority voting rights—dramatized by recent violence in the Delta—and the harassment, intimidation and force employed against the whites who dare dissent from segregationist orthodoxy. Perhaps the most damaging effects, however, of this state of mind are being felt in other areas of public life.

IN the current emotional atmosphere the unscrupulous have virtual immunity so long as they act in the name of segregation. Charlatans who would be laughed off the streets in normal times find a receptive audience. History is rewritten, substituting pleasing fiction for unpleasant fact. And the Mississippian, who bows to no man in loyalty to country, lends encouragement or stands by silently while his public officials flirt with sedition.

The extent to which these developments have tried the patience of persons outside the state is apparent in a recent recommendation of the Civil Rights Commission. The commissioners pointed out that Mississippi paid only $270,000,000 in taxes into the Federal Treasury during the 1962 fiscal year, while receiving $650,000,000 in return. They urged President Kennedy to determine if he had legal authority to withhold this aid until Mississippi ended its "subversion of the Constitution." (The President said he did not have such power.)

The day of the commission's proposal, a state official suggested that Mississippi might retaliate in kind. Fred Ross, State Commissioner of Public Welfare, said: "The question now arises as to how much longer the white population of Mississippi will continue to consent to be taxed and drained of its sustenance for the benefit of a race and nation which show no appreciation for their sacrifices, in order to destroy itself by integration."

Can Mississippi afford its uncompromising position on race? What social debits has it incurred by its intransigency? What factors underlie the refusal to face reality? Is there basis for hope that the state will heed the few courageous leaders who are urging a return to sanity? These questions can be examined but not firmly answered.

To understand Mississippi's interracial conflict, one must first consider the nature of the state and its people. Despite its monolithic image, Mississippi is a mosaic.

THE Gulf Coast gives it a touch of Florida. Salt marshes and piney woods alternate with groves of moss-draped live oaks and stretches of sandy beach. Mansions of fading elegance compete with plush motels for attention along U.S. Route 90. The coast already has shipbuilding, papermaking and fishing industries, and soon will have a $125 million oil refinery and a $400 million testing center for moon rocket engines.

To the north lie cut-over timberlands, small farms and a succession of dusty county-seat towns. Deserted fields and empty storefronts tell of the loss of population to the state's small but growing cit- (Continued on Page 104)

CLAUDE SITTON is Southern Correspondent for The New York Times, based in Atlanta.

CAMPS

CO-EDUCATIONAL

KEWANEE Boys & Girls 4-16 Yrs.

NEVERSINK, N. Y. (95 MI) (N.Y.C.)

250 BEAUTIFUL ACRES (2000' Elev.) • Pollen free • Superb facilities • Outstanding mature staff • Professional Black-Top Tennis and Basketball Courts • Creative Crafts • Drama-Music Program • All Land & Water Sports • PRIVATE SPRING-FED LAKE AND OLYMPIC POOL • Modern plumbing and Hot Showers in ALL Bunks • Tripping—Overnight Camping • Amateur Radio • Horseback Riding—Own Corral & Trails • Golf Instruction • Resident M.D. and Nurse • Excellent Jewish-American cuisine • Individual Attention for first-time Campers • CAMPER-WAITERS (16+)

$625 FEE INCL. INSURANCE TRANSPORTATION HORSEBACK RIDING LAUNDRY, ETC. MEMBER A.C.A.

Directors: ALLEN MANASEE (Adm., Elem. School) RENEE FINK (Prin. Elem. School)

Write or Call for Brochure: CAMP KEWANEE 1 Colonial Rd., Searsdale, N.Y. LU 4-5400 (N.Y.C. Office) SCarsd. 3-2582 (Eves. & Holidays)

AN ADVENTURE CAMP IN THE HILLS OF CONN.

DIAMOND J RANCH

8 Weeks $625 5 Weeks $425 3 Weeks $255

SEPARATE TEEN-AGE VILLAGE

WESTERN RANGE RIDING PROGRAM 2 Hours Riding Daily • Beef Raising • Quadrilles • Packtrips • Wrangling with the Cowboys • Trail Blazing • Last Roundup • Rodeos

ENGLISH OR WESTERN SADDLERY

• Co-Ed 5-17 • Member American Camping Association

PRIVATE LAKE . . . WATER-SKIING . . . SPORTS & CRAFTS

JESSIE LITTMAN, 31-33 81st St., Jackson Heights, NE 9-7533

BOYS—GIRLS 9 yrs. to 17 yrs.

SUMMER 1963 (June 30 to Aug. 25) 125 Acre Estate 90 Miles from N.Y.C.

CAMP STATE

FULL PROGRAM: Orchestra • Concert • Dance Bands • Chorus • Theory • Conducting • Music History • Dancing—Trips • All Sports • Social • Activities • Private Lake • Boating • Fishing • Tennis • New Pool

Private Lessons by Accredited Teachers

HURLEYVILLE 1, NEW YORK

Write or Phone COLLECT: Hurleyville 701

JACK KRAMER, B.S., LL.B., Camp Dir. • Joseph LaRuffa, B.S., M.A. in Music Ed., Music Dir.

CAMP LEXINGTON Est. 1934

Co-ed LEXINGTON, N. Y. (5-15)

In The Rip Van Winkle Country

LAND & WATER SPORTS RIDING NATURAL SCIENCES PHOTOGRAPHY FINE ARTS & CRAFTS PERFORMING ARTS

TUTORING

Evelyn & Hi Weisberg, Dirs.

82-19 Grenfell St., Kew Gardens, N. Y. HI 1-3030

IROQUOIS 42 years of outstanding camping in beautiful Peterborough, N. H.

Junior Camp 6-8 Ask about our special fee. Unusual Program for younger children.

8-13 Group Top-notch program. Organization without regimentation.

Teen-Age 13-17 Individualized Athletic-Social Program for 80 boys & girls.

POLLEN FREE—COED—Separate campus areas and athletic facilities—separate water fronts—All land and water sports—Water Skiing—Riding—Tennis—Music—Dance—Theatre Workshop—Trips. Friday evening services—Prof. Staff—R.N.

Lee Trigoboff, 732 Shepherd Ave., Brooklyn 8, N. Y., NI 9-5019

(Member American Camping Assoc.)

Stonegate Music & Arts Camp

On Long Lake, N.Y. In the Pollen Free Adirondacks

MUSIC • THEATRE • DANCE • ART

Full Sports program—Symphony Orch.—Concert Band—Workshops—Chorus—Voice—Trips, Co-ed 10-18. Camper-Waiter. CIT Programs. Tuition inc. Lessons

Disting. Faculty Incl. DR. FRITZ KRAMER (N.Y. Philharmonic Concert Lectures) Dirs. LOUIS A. ROTH, DR. RICHARD KARP Dir. Pitts Opera—HARRY A. ALSHIN

NYC OFFICE: 342 Madison Ave., New York 17, TN 7-6690

Westchester ROgers 9-7881, Pittsburgh JAckson 1-1797, Montreal HU 9-7733

BOYS-GIRLS 5-16 CAMP NA-SHO-PA 65 MILES N.Y.C.

BLOOMINGBURG, N. Y.

27th year same directorship — 200 acres. Modern cabins with all in-door facilities. Paved walks, private lake with beautiful waterfront, pool, sailing, canoeing. All land sports. 3 baseball fields, regulation black top tennis & basketball courts, 9 hole golf course, horseback riding, go-karts, riflery & archery.

Crafts, music, band, drama, nature & trips. C.I.T. program. New recreation hall. Mature experienced staff, Res. M.D. & Reg. nurse. Dietary laws.

Member A.C.A. — Standards Accredited Member of A.P.C.

Baer & Charlotte Krell—46-24 218 St., Bayside 61, N. Y. BA 4-9145

KEZAR LAKE CAMP

WHITE MTS. LOVELL, MAINE COED 6-15

An Adventure in Camping

Mr. & Mrs. Barnett T. Lambert, 124 Highview Ave., Eastchester, N.Y. Woodbine 1-8595 Mr. & Mrs. Samuel T. Lambert, 39 Beechwood Road, Hartsdale, N. Y. WH 6-6154

Camp Webatuck on Lake Ellis Wingdale, N. Y.

A non-profit, inter-racial, supervised co-ed camp; ages 7-17; 4 or 8 wk. period. Special program young children. Teenage work camp, C.I.T. program. Exciting inter-cultural activities, sports.

LESTER SPEISER—Dir.; NORMAN STUDER—Consult.; PETE SEEGER—Mus. Adv. Write for brochure. 166 5 AVE., N. Y. or Phone OR 5-4383.

CO-EDUCATIONAL

New Hope Academy of The Performing Arts

"RAMBLERNY"

Bucks County

Star Rte 263—New Hope, Penna.

Stimulating—Satisfying—Summer

8 WEEK RESIDENT COURSE

June 30th—August 25th

Pre-teen-Teenagers

Young Adult & Professional Courses Co-ed, Dance, Drama, Art, Voice, Musical Comedy, Theatre Performances, Dormitories, Adult Supervision, Guest Artists, Sports, Beautiful Campus

STAFF—1963

| | |
|---|---|
| Modern Dance: | JOSE LIMON master classes |
| Jazz: | BOB HAMILTON |
| Pantomime: | MATA & HARI |
| Jazz Satire: | JUKI ARKIN |
| Ballet: | JURY GOTSCHALKS |
| | IRENE APINEE |
| Drama: | JOHN LEHNE advanced workshop |
| | RENATA MANNHARDT |
| | ROBINSON STONE |
| Musical Comedy: | IRWIN STAHL |
| Voice: | GRETA HARTWIG |
| | FRED STEELE |
| Art: | BETTYE MAZOR |

DON'T WAIT! ACT NOW! PERFORM SOON!

We make it easy—here you are trained —Auditioned—and Discovered!

IF YOU ARE LOOKING FOR ACTIVITY—THIS IS YOUR ANSWER

A Ramblerny student has either a sincere interest in the Arts as a rewarding Cultural Experience or has chosen Theatre as a Career—Courses for both are offered.

TUITION $795

Includes room & board

Open for Inspection

Brochure on request

call, collect or write—

Florence Snyderman, Director

New Hope, (215) 862-2022,

(NYC tel: YU 8-6510)

CAMP WOODLAND, INC.

Phoenicia, N.Y.

25th year of Interracial, Intercultural Co-educational Camping

Experienced, professional staff. All sports, science, music, drama, trips. Suitable work projects for all children. Ages 6 to 14. Special Training Programs for a limited and selected group of High School students. Four or eight week periods.

Phone for appointment:

SARA ABRAMSON, Director

853 B'way, N.Y.C. 3. AL 4-2526

Member American Camping Ass'n.

MOHAWK in the Berkshires Near Tanglewood

ENJOY A FUN FILLED PROGRAM:

LAND & WATER SPORTS • ARTS • MUSIC • SCIENCE • TRIPS

H. Schulman, 16 Bronson Av., Searsdale, N. Y. SC 3-1485, R. Schulman, 240 W. Post Rd., White Plains, N. Y. RO 1-3233

$650—Coed—6-15 yrs.

TAMARAC CAMP • Nicholson, Pa.

Western & English riding daily

Jewish-American Chuckwagon

Weekly Rodeos • All Sports

Resident M.D. & R.N.

Moderate Fee

Foreman: Dick Krebs

1957 71 Ave., Phila. 38, Pa.

WA 4-8273. In NY: MU 7-9000

CO-ED Sports

KE-KE-TAW Blairstown, N.J. Coed—3-14 yrs.

8 Wks. $345.00 • 4 Wks. $185.00

20th season. Screened cabins, modern sanitary facilities, infirmary, nurse, experienced staff, homelike atmosphere, swimming, riding, crafts, sports, trips. Brochure: R. Gerkhardt, Box T, 785W, Caldwell, N.J. or phone CApitol 6-8100 collect.

The Mississippi Mind

(Continued from Page 13)

ies — Pascagoula, Gulfport, Hattiesburg, Meridian, Jackson, Vicksburg and Greenville.

The rolling hills that extend northward from the Gulf coastal plain are broken on the east by stretches of Black Belt prairie and on the west by the Delta. This football-shaped expanse of level fields of sandy loam and buckshot clay reaches 200 miles from Vicksburg to Memphis, one of the richest cotton-growing areas in America.

MISSISSIPPI was settled by planters and slaves from the worn-out farms of the southern Piedmont. Streaming into the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw at the beginning of the 19th century, they built an empire on cotton. The state became one of the nation's richest. But much of its wealth was wiped out by the Civil War, subsequent depressions and the boll weevil.

With the coming of agricultural mechanization, cotton production remained profitable only in the Delta. Even there, the tractor, the mechanical picker and chemicals have slashed the need for labor. As a result, hundreds of thousands of Mississippians have migrated to the North and Middle West.

Negroes, who once outnumbered whites, now make up only 43 per cent of the state's population of 2,178,141, according to the Bureau of the Census. They are in the majority in the Delta counties, but more and more are leaving because they have no work for eight or nine months a year.

Mississippians are still a largely rural people. Only 38 per cent live in urban areas. Most of the state's manufacturing jobs are in scattered, small textile and apparel plants. Jackson, the capital, is the state's largest city. It has a population of 150,000, a jet airport under construction, and one of the nation's few gold-plated bathrooms. This last was installed in the Governor's mansion at a cost of $10,000 by Gov. Ross R. Barnett.

MISSISSIPPI is the poorest state in the nation and some residents considered the Governor's expenditure excessive in view of a shortage of funds for education and other state services. The state had a per capita income in 1961 of only $1,229, compared with a national average of $2,263. The median annual family income of its whites was $4,209, and of its Negroes, $1,444.

The state has the third highest illiteracy rate—4.9 per cent —in the nation, trailing only South Carolina and Louisiana. A total of 32,196 of its Negroes and 8,444 of its whites have never attended school. A far larger number, 119,741 Negroes and 40,274 whites, are considered functional illiterates.

Mississippi offers a study in contrasts, especially in the Delta. Greek-revival mansions and rambling ranch houses in groves of shade trees look out on weather-beaten rows of clapboard cabins and tar-paper shacks, most of which have open privies and some of which lack even running water. A planter dressed in expensive Western boots and hat gets up from a leisurely meal in a restaurant and displays a rare dime valued at $90 from his coin collection. Less than a mile away, a Negro mother arises and prepares a breakfast of sugar syrup and hoecake for her children, some of whom cannot attend school because they have no shoes.

OLD MISSISSIPPI — Negroes pick

The state's campaign for economic expansion has reached a promising stage. The International Paper Company plant whose towering smokestack dominates the tidewater town of Moss Point, the cargo ships and nuclear submarines on the ways in the Ingalls Shipyard in Pascagoula and the Standard Oil refinery under construction at Bayou Casotte offer impressive evidence of progress.

BUSINESS experts see no evidence that segregation has hampered such industrial growth. Continuing racial unrest is another thing indeed. A leading financial economist in the Southeast predicts that Mississippi's number of new plant acquisitions will begin to decline at midyear. "It will continue shrinking for a long time to come, until and unless the state shows that it is willing to rejoin the Union," he says.

High as is the economic cost of intransigency, the social cost is higher. A thumbnail sketch of what white supremacy means in Mississippi is provided in a current report of the state advisory committee to the Federal Civil Rights Commission. It should be noted that its members are Mississippians.

"The committee's investigations have indicated that in all important areas of citizenship, a Negro in Mississippi receives substantially less than his due consideration as an American and as a Mississippian. This denial extends from the time he is denied the right to be born in a nonsegregated hospital, through his segregated and inferior school years and his productive years when jobs for which he can qualify are refused, to the day he dies and is laid to rest in a cemetery for Negroes only."

Further, Negroes frequently are denied the most effective

cotton by hand in the Delta.

recourse from these wrongs—the ballot. The extreme to which disfranchisement goes and the irrational behavior of some whites when confronted by a mere attempt to remedy the situation have just been underscored in Leflore County in the Delta.

MORE than 95 per cent of the county's whites 21 years of age and older are registered, but less than 2 per cent of its Negroes. State law gives voter registrars almost sole discretion in saying who may and who may not vote.

The Justice Department recently instituted a Federal court action against registrars in Leflore and six other Mississippi counties. But even under reasonable regulations fairly applied, the ignorance and impoverishment of many Leflore County Negroes would preclude their registration. Thus, it would appear that, with the cards so patently stacked in favor of white political supremacy, the registration campaign started there last August would have caused no stir. Not so. Campaign workers have been threatened, harassed, beaten and shot.

Such terrorism has not been restricted to Leflore County or to the Delta. The Voter Education Project, an Atlanta-based organization financed by national foundations, has issued a list of 64 separate acts of violence and intimidation directed against Negroes since January, 1961, in more than a dozen counties. Virtually all of these incidents were related to registration activities.

THE corrosive effects of racism on whites as well as Negroes are shown even more clearly in the story of Mississippi's resistance to desegregation in education. The last chapter has yet to be written about this phase of the struggle. But it already has brought the entire state to the brink of rebellion against the Federal Government.

The action came last Sept. 13, when Governor Barnett invoked the legally discredited doctrine of interposition. He announced that he was placing the power of the state between the University of Mississippi and the Federal Courts to prevent the admission of James H. Meredith, a 29-year-old Negro. It is doubtful that Mr. Barnett, a shrewd damage-suit lawyer, thought interposition would work for him more than it had for Gov. Jimmy H. Davis of Louisiana in his efforts to block Negroes from the New Orleans public schools.

Nevertheless, like demagogues before him, Governor Barnett apparently felt compelled to stage a show of defiance while negotiating a surrender under the table. If such was his intention, he misjudged the mood of his people with fatal results.

GIVEN the Governor's refusal to preserve order and the Kennedy Administration's decision to enforce desegregation initially with Federal deputy marshals rather than with troops, the riots of Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 on the Ole Miss campus and in the adjoining town of Oxford were inevitable. One might have thought that the death of two men and the incalculable damage to the state and nation would have had a sobering effect on segregationists. Any such illusions were soon dispelled by declarations of the type made by a Jackson newspaper columnist:

"Watch the peace-lovers come to the fore, grab a nigger-neck and start bellowing brotherly love," he wrote. "For us . . . we'll just go on being a bigot, a reactionary, a rebel and lick our wounds till the next fight starts and plan to win somehow. We are licked but not beaten!"

Some Mississippians believe that the rest of the nation is on their side and that succor cannot be long in coming. "I

(Continued on Following Page)

CAMPS

CO-EDUCATIONAL

Camp SASKATCHEWAN
On Schroon Lake
ADIRONDACK, N. Y.
BOYS-GIRLS (6-17)
We offer your Child in the ARTS Music, Dancing, Painting and Dramatics.
LAND All Sports, including Tennis, Physical fitness, Golf, Trampolin, Riding.
WATER All Phases incl. Canoeing, Sailing & SKIING expertly taught.
CRAFTS Construction, Jewelry, Ceramics, Photography, Stagecraft, Pioneering.
CULTURAL Typing, Language Study; French, Spanish, Russian, College Board Preparation, Journalism, Science.
TEEN-AGERS (13-17) Partial Work Scholarships available to qualified teen-agers.
FEE $650
SCIENCE PROGRAM
Experimentation & research in well equipped Labs supervised by SOL FELDMAN, author of "Techniques & Investigations in Life Sciences." $50 additional fee for Science Program.
Write or Phone for our Booklet:
"Your Child at Camp"
PETER LIEFF, Dir.—HI 5-2557 or FL 8-8830
162-41 Powells Cove Blvd. Beechhurst 57, N. Y.
★★★ Member American Camping Ass'n ★★★

AMHERST MUSIC CENTER
Coed, age 12-20. 8 or 4 wks. MUSIC STUDY, June 30-Aug. 25, in Sebago Lake region, Raymond, Maine. Seminars under noted musicians in voice, all instruments. Academic music. Orchestra, bands, chorus. Exceptionally beautiful location, facilities. ¼ mi. white sandy beach. Swimming, boating, tennis, archery. Brochure:
Dr. J. Clement Schuler
Box 102, Montague, Mass.

CAMP STAR LAKE
A superior program for boys and girls 6-16, emphasizing water sports, athletics and creative arts. Remedial reading available. Pollen free. Dietary Laws observed.
Special co-ed teen camp-tour program, traveling to Niagara Falls, Canada, Shakespearean Festival, Thousand Islands and Tanglewood.
Phone OX 7-8164
Directors: Eleanor and Ben Saxe
342 Madison Ave., N.Y. 17, N.Y.
Duane, N. Y. Dr. Tassy Singerman
Est. 1946 4901 Van Horne Montreal, Que.
Victor 5-7928

BET-CHEN 8 wks. $400 4 wks. $225
Horseback Riding On Premises
75 miles fr. N. Y. C. Co-ed 5-14; 31st yr.
• Olympic Pool • Swim Instruction
• Modern Cabins • All Sports & Crafts
• Fully Equipped • Dramatics—Tennis
• Jewish Am. Cuisine • Mature Counselors
• Registered Nurse • Memb. American Camp Assoc.
Camp Bet-Chen, 1095 2d Av., N. Y. 22, N. Y.
Call anytime PL 1-4754

Coed 7-13 JOSEDALE RANCH
CRAZY 'BOUT HORSES?
This is it! Nestled in the Berkshire Hills — our 500-acre pvt. estate is open to you in the summer. An operating Ranch (over 100 head cattle and horses). Each camper receives calf to care for, rope, etc. Horseback riding daily w/instr., hay rides, swimming, fairs. $275 1 month, $500 2 months.
Mr. and Mrs. E.H. Madsen, Hillsdale, N.Y.

HILLTOP BOYS 5-16
HILL MANOR GIRLS 5-16
Two separate camps. Complete RIDING program—camp owned horses. Mature leadership. Excellent swimming, boating, skiing, fishing. Trips. Tennis, riflery, pioneering. All sports. Crafts, dancing. Prot. & Cath. services at camp. 8 wks. $650. Catalogs.
H. T. HILLMAN, 8618 110th Street
Richmond Hill 18, N. Y. • VI 9-7362

GREEN CHIMNEYS
Coed 2-12 years. Permanent buildings. Daily riding and swimming. Sports. 75 acre farm. Non-sectarian. Resident physician and nurse. Also, winter boarding school. Brochure T. Director
S. B. Ross, Jr., M. A., Brewster, N.Y. BR 9-2996

CAMP ETON Rhinebeck, N. Y. 2 hrs. from N. Y. C.
Co-ed. 4-16. Deluxe cabins. Pvt. lake. New filtered swimming pool. All sports, music, drama, crafts. Exp. staff. Res. Dr. & Nurse. Strictly Kosher. JACK ABOFF, 193 Shelley Avenue, Elizabeth, N. J. 3-0170. N. Y. ph. MU 6-0339

CO-EDUCATIONAL

CAMP KENT FOR BOYS & GIRLS AGES 6½ to 15½
Kent, Conn., 85 miles from N.Y.C. Several hundred scenic acres high in Berkshire Mountain vicinity with large private lake. Low pollen area. Water sports include instruction in all phases of American Red Cross, Boating, Canoeing, Sailing, Aquaplaning, Water-Skiing, Fishing. Outstanding riding instruction, miles of Bridle Paths & Riding Ring. Land sports including 4 baseball diamonds, basketball, 8 clay tennis courts, archery. All under direction of professional & physical education staff — includes individualized instruction. Dance, Music, Drama, Advanced Arts & Crafts, trips to Tanglewood, Jacob's Pillow & Summer Stock, Movies, cook-outs, Indian lore, Nature, Mod. bldgs. & sanitation. C.I.T. program.
FOR YOUNG FRY — Separate facilities and equipment, own snack room. Full program geared to meet the needs, interests and capacities of this age level. Tutoring in all academic subjects if desired.
$650 8 week season—includes Transportation, Laundry and Insurance. Jewish-American Cuisine. Resident M. D. and Nurses — Member Amer. Camping Assoc.
WRITE OR CALL FOR BROCHURE
27 West 72nd St., N. Y. C., SU 7-0264, or Yonkers Phone: BEverly 7-3323, E. N. Rothschild
Near the . . . . . Cultural Centers BERKSHIRE

DERRY 15th Season in Certified Pollen Free Londonderry, Vermont
200 Mi. Fr. N.Y.C.
BOYS-GIRLS 6 to 17
All Athletic, Land Sports at its "Best." (Black-Top Courts). Fencing, Golf, Bowling, Roller-Skating, Baseball, Tennis, Riflery, etc. HORSES (our Corrals & Trails). AQUATIC PROGRAMS—Private Spring-Fed Lake. WATERSKIING on premises, etc. Cultural, Creative, Performing Arts Programs: Dance Techniques & Skills. Drama (in our Famed Londonderry Theatre Workshop). Music (all Instruments—Guitar, etc.) Science, Mechanics, Electronics, Nature, Trips, Seminars, Tutoring, C.I.T., Co-Op Waiter, Small-Fry Groups. Modern Facilities, Dietary Laws. Resident M.D. and Nurse.
R. P. Gold Altman, A. Gold, M.D., 525 E. Park Ave., Long Beach, L. I. N. Y C.—CO 5-8383

LOHIKAN CAMPS LAKE COMO, PA. (135 mi. NYC) 8 Wk. session only GREELEY, PA. 85 mi. NYC—4 Wk & 8 Wk. session
~~COED, 5-15, All 2000'~~
DAILY HORSEBACK RIDING incl. in fee
POCONO MOUNTAINS. 50 acre & 100 acre natural lakes. 75' Swimming pool, 60 camp owned mounts; Modern cabins with sanitation; Showers with Hot & Cold water; Regular Program. OVERNIGHT CANOE & HORSEBACK TRIPS. Mature staff; RN. Michael F. Buynak B. S., LL.B.
4 WEEK SESSION $295 8 WEEK SESSION $535 Write for Brochure
N. Y. Office 507 Fifth Ave., New York, NY Oxford 7-5895
N. J. Office 516 Blvd., Kenilworth, N. J. Bridge 6-0996

Co-ed, 5-15, Livingston Manor, N. Y.
Individual attention given to all campers.
OIL PAINTING LESSONS BY PROFESSIONAL ARTIST.
Sports, riding, riflery, music, crafts, movies, dancing, boating, swimming, filtered pool. Cabins with hot showers. Flexible program. Mature counselors. Teen-Age Program. Non-sect. Catalog.
Miss Irene Depew, M. A. Director
18 Linden St., Great Neck, N.Y. HUnter 7-4828
Member of The American Camping Association

WINAMAC RIDING CAMP
ON LAKE WHITTEMORE, BENNINGTON, N. H.
A Camp for Boys & Girls who like Horses & Water Sports
5-15 yrs. Beginners-Experts. Instruction for ring, long and short rides, horse shows. Grooming, drill work. Jumping, training. 65 acres. Wooded trails. Crystal clear lake in the Monadnock Mts. Pollen free. Red Cross swimming boating, canoeing, sailing and water skiing. Junior League baseball, basketball, riflery, tennis, dancing, dramatics, trips, $600. Est. 10 yrs. Non-sect. Write Mr. Russell MacFarlane, Director, 437 Pelham Road, New Rochelle, N. Y. Tel.: NE 2-2920.

AVOID DISAPPOINTMENT REGISTER EARLY
Westmont COED—4-16 YRS. 75 Mi. from N.Y.C. $475
TEEN-AGE PROGRAM, FILTERED POOL, MUSIC PROGRAM
Res. M.D. & R.N., swimming, boating, baseball, skating, min. golf, bowling, tennis, Creative activities, stage, playhouse, cabins, showers & bathrooms. Jew. Amer. Cuisine, golf range, fencing, trips, riding opt. YOUNG FRY—Separate facilities & equipment. Children's Camps, Box 541, W. Englewood, N.J. Call anytime N.Y. PE 6-6280; N.J. TE 7-7119
MEMBER AMER. CAMP'G ASS'N

AISHEL 18th Yr. Co-ed 4-16 Spring Glenn, N. Y. 75 Miles From N.Y.C.
$465 8 wks. $250 4 wks.
Lake, Pool, Rowing, Fishing, Baseball, Basketball, new Volley Ball, Handball and Tennis Courts, Riding, Music, Dramatics, Arts and Crafts, Bunks equipped with electricity, running hot & cold water & showers, innerspring mattresses, combination aluminum screening and windows, mature staff, resident Dr., Dietary Food, Sabbath services. (Fee includes laundry, fare, linen & insurance).
M. Weiss, Dir., 2273 E. 19th St., Bklyn., DE 2-2957; DE 2-2909; TW 1-6900

CAMP SHANGRI-LA
Boys & Girls 5-15 Accord, N. Y.
Pvt. Lake • Filtered Pool •
All Land & Water Sports • Crafts • Ceramics • Riding • Animal care • Roller rink • Dramatics • Pioneering • Tripping • Kosher cuisine • Res. Phys. & Nurse. $595
Dirs: M. & E. Plotsker CLoverdale 3-8531
1165 East 9th St. Brooklyn 30, N. Y.

FAIR HAVEN $25 per week Harrisonburg, Va.
In the beautiful Blue Ridge Mts. Coed. 7-15 yrs. June 22-Aug. 24. Riding, swimming, sports, trips to caverns. Good food, accommodations; understanding counselors. Folder. P. O. Box 629-T, Harrisonburg, Virginia

MILBROOK
EST. 1938 ON WONDERFUL CAPE COD
BOYS 6 to 16 GIRLS 6 to 16
Crystal clear swimming. Water skiing. all sports. trips. Mature staff. Modern facilities. Fri. Eve. services. Res. Dr. & Nurse. Excel. food. Season $625. CIT $525. Basketball under Casey Jones. Boston Celtics. For interview write: Gerald Volk, 5 Pickwick Road, West Newton, Mass. BIgelow 4-6741; in New York, SPencer 9-2763.

Kooaukee Co-ed, 6-14 Strafford, N.H. 43rd season
Separate campuses include water sports on Bow Lake, riding on private trails and field sports. Trips to Wt. Mountains and seashore. Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Wyre, 151 Cane St., Teaneck, N. J. TE 6-2887.

NOTTINGHAM CAMPS
Boys & girls 8-16. Separate camps. Riding riflery, swimming, sailing, fishing, golf. Dramatics. Summer school. Near Phila., C. C. Burley, Box 210, Colora, Maryland. Baltimore, Catalog. Tel. Rising Sun 420.

CAMPS

CO-EDUCATIONAL

VAN'S HIDE-A-WAY RANCH

East Jewett, N. Y.

Outstanding Western Teen-age program

For 200 boys and girls 10-16

OWN YOUR OWN HORSE WITH SPECIAL RANCHERS VACATION (FEE INCLUDES BILL OF SALE). A complete western vacation, rodeos, pack trips, water skiing, square dancing to the twist, plus all regular camping activities, swimming pool, modern facilities. Mature staff, excellent food, registered nurse, pollen-free area 2½ hours from N. Y. C.

For Young 'Uns, 5-10, Special Junior Ranch & Game Farm, $445

Limited enrollment 50. Specialized staff. Daily horseback riding, instructions all sports, care & feed small game. Pre-summer tour beginning May 10th with return of deposits and payments if not fully satisfied.

Write 256 East 49th Street, N. Y. C. Tel: PL 3-9572, PE 6-6280; N. J. TE 7-7119

LANGUAGE STUDY CAMPS
AT WESTMINSTER SCHOOL

June 29-Aug. 24 — Simsbury, Conn.

DO 2-3 YEARS OF LANGUAGE WORK . . . . . LIVE-PLAY-LEARN-DO SPORTS AND GAMES—ENJOY YOURSELF, ALL IN FRENCH OR GERMAN

— a new language training under university experts in languages and linguistics: students learn to think and react in French or German.
— a no-English milieu for which the student is prepared in the initial 3 weeks so he can function and communicate in his new language.
— a program combining learning and play in small groups of 5 students per native instructor in day-long language training and practice.
— each recreational activity in sports and games prepared beforehand in French or German in class, then applied under the instructor.
— intensive 8 week course for students 14-18 co-ed grouped by age and by aptitude and previous preparation into 10 different levels.

WRITE: THE SECRETARY, LANGUAGE STUDY CAMPS, BOX 567 HARTFORD 1, CONNECTICUT

BOYS-GIRLS 6-15 BOYS CW 16-17 GIRLS CIT 16-17

BIRCH HILL CAMPS

New Durham, New Hampshire

The paticular camp for the particular parent in the pollen-free White Mountains

- Two separate campuses
- Unexcelled staff
- Dr. & R.N. on premises
- Complete athletic program
- Sailing, Water Skiing on private lake
- Music, Dramatics, Dance, Painting

Director: PAUL BOROFF, 38 Elbow Lane, Levittown, N.Y., Tel. 516 PE 1-3929

25 YRS. OF RANCHING EXPERIENCE • BOYS & GIRLS—AGES 9 to 14

RAWHIDE RANCH

LAKE HILL (Ulster Co) NY • 2 Hrs. NYC via Thruway

For that Vacation on Horseback. RIDE YOUR OWN HORSE FOR THE SEASON! Learn the 3 R's of the Range — RIDING, ROPING & RODEO. Swimming, Pack trips, Roundups, other sports. WESTERN COWBOYS & COWGIRLS. Limited Enrollment. High elev., 50,000 acres of mountain trails. Fee incl. transp., linens. Tutoring available. Directed by original Founder of the First Children's Ranch in the East.

JACK & "PEE WEE" FRANKS. N. Y. C. Tel. OXford 7-4486

CAMP DELMONT

SKIN DIVING TEEN-AGE PROGRAM

Boys & Girls 6-16 Yrs. Livingston Manor, N.Y.

Pollen free, 2400 ft. alt., pioneering. All land & lake activities as sailing, water skiing, ceramics, crafts, dramatics, ham radio, res. M.D., nurse, modern bunks. Special attention tiny-tot, 6-8 years old. Special

Sol Siegel, 45 Kew Gardens Rd. Kew Gardens 15, N. Y.—LI 4-7290

Bob Bedell, 84-10 Main St. Jamaica 35, N. Y.—HI 1-6866

CAMP NATCHEZ

A.C.A. MEMBER

Co-Ed 6 to 16 also camper waiter C.I.T. program

$600. 8 weeks

rate is lower for more than one child in same family. Includes linens, blankets, transportation, ins., R.N., M.D.

WEST COPAKE, N.Y.

Exquisitely located in the Berkshire foothills 105 miles from NYC, on beautiful Lake Rhoda. Magnificent modern facilities. Jewish-American cuisine, sailing, water skiing, every possible land sport, all crafts and cultural activities, and of course a top-notch staff

Dir. Nat. Schafler, Arch. Des. Anita Schafler, BS, PE, area code 516—Ea. 9-4301
Lee Paseltiner, BS, MS. 4 Dunford St., Huntington Station 18, area code 516—AR 1-6623
Harry Hecht, BA, MA., 5905 Shore Parkway, Bklyn 36, N.Y., CL 1-5949
Lucille Rokaw LE 2-4560

TIMBERTRAILS

A COED RIDING AND SPORTS CAMP IN S. E. VERMONT

Offers boys & girls 6-16 the challenge of becoming skilled in horsemanship. Fee inc. DAILY RIDING, jumping, expert instruction. English saddles. Trail rides, Horse Show. Private lake, water sports, canoe & overnight trips, riflery, tennis, baseball, Crafts, music. Pollen free Modern cabins. Reg. nurse.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert T. Jayson, Owner-Directors
67 Highland Ave., Roslyn, New York (Summer: Chester, Vt.)
MAyfair 516-1-5440 or ORegon 5-3144

CAMP GOOD NEWS ON CAPE COD

On Cape Cod. Separate camps for boys and girls 5-16. 29th season same management. 307 acres. Sports, trips, swimming, canoeing, sailing, handcraft, horses, tennis. We aim to build Christian character. 4 wks. $135 to $250. 8 wks. $250 to $450.
Tel. Bloomfield, N.J. Pilgrim 3-8197
Chaplain W. Willard, Box 382, Waltham, Mass.

GOLDEN ARROW in N. H.

$550—8 Wks

YOUR CHILD COUNTS IN A SMALL CAMP

Swim canoe sail
Hike ride dance
Sculpt paint build

Age 7-13
Non-competitive
Special Music Program

Bruce & Helen Charpentier, MAs Ed, Psych.
24-56 86th St., Jackson Hts. 69, N.Y. DE 5-0575

BYRCHWOOD

ON LAKE PLACID NEW YORK

8 wks. $510. — Instruction • Swim • Canoe • Water Ski • Sail • Ice Skate • Dance • Riding • Science — 4 wks. $275.

L. Platnik 152-05 85 Dr. Ja. N. Y. JA 6-3088

JUG HILL

camp for little people from 3 to 12 years

Pets, horses on 80-acre farm. Swim, fish, boat in private lake. Creative arts. Trips. Mature staff. Non-competitive program. 90 miles from NYC at Clinton Hollow, N. Y.

Charles and Esther Kiviat, Directors.
25 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C. 3. ALgonquin 4-7801

CO-EDUCATIONAL

Announcement

A new unit of Shaker Village for teen-age boys and girls is now being established. Additional openings are expected to be available for next summer for boys age 14 to 17, girls 13 to 16.

The Shaker Village program provides opportunities that foster growth and confidence of the adolescent through educationally planned work experiences, community life and profitable use of leisure.

For enrollment information, state age as of next July, present school year. Write *Registrar

Shaker Village WORK GROUP

Box 1149CT, Pittsfield, Mass.
N. Y. Phone LO 4-5850

CAMPS ST. REGIS

On Shelter Island Sound
EAST HAMPTON, L. I.

Separate Camps for Boys, Girls 5-1 Salt water swimming, sailing, al sports. Riding. Medical Staff. Jesuit Chaplain. Mature staff, including: Don Kennedy, Director of Athletics. St. Peter's College. Fee $495—Tuition Plan. Write or phone for Catalogue. Frank "Bo" Adams (Formerly Fordham Basketball Coach), 1594 Metropolitan Avenue, Bronx 62, N Y. Phone: UN 3-2630.

Pocono Crest Camps

Pocono Manor Pa.

CHICKAGAMI for BOYS
NAWAKWA for GIRLS

Controlled by Valparaiso University. 38th Season. Ages 6-17. 2000 Acres atop the Poconos. Lake, Sand Beach. Spotrs and Creative Activity Riding Tennis.. Experienced Councelors. Physician Church Services.

4 Weeks $180—8 Weeks $325

Illustrated Booklet "TC" N. Y. Office Suite 699, 11 West 42nd St. LO 5-1550

Camp Mach-a-Naim

for boys & girls, 4-18

Monticello, N.Y. • 85 mi—NYC

2 filtered pools; all sports; private lake; horseback riding on premises; modern bungalows; trained staff; doctor & nurse.

Directors: A. Jacobson, B. Gann
Dietary Laws observed
186 Bay 32d St., Bklyn., N. Y.
ES 2-1296
FO 5-0928 - VI 6-3379
CY 8-7783
OUR 34th YEAR

APPLE HILL

E. Sullivan, N.H. Boys & Girls 6-15

Each child encouraged to develop as a happy responsible person. International group. DAILY RIDING, sports, crafts. Uniforms supplied. Work program. 13-15. Husband - wife owners - directors. Write

Mrs. Beverley Robinson Placzek, Director
Apt. 2-A, 176 W. 87 St., New York City
Tel. TR 4-7679

CAMP ED-RO

Kerhonkson, N. Y. 90 mi. from NYC $460-8 Wks; $245-4 Wks.

Co-ed 6-16

- Filtered Olympic Pool
- Showers in Bunks
- Jewish Am. Cuisine
- Creative Dramatics
- All Sports, Dancing
- Hikes & Trips
- Camper Workers
- CIT Program
- Tchr. Trained Staff
- Tutoring Available

F. P. BERTISCH, Asst. Princ. NYC. Jr. H.S.
Prin. Reform Relig. Sch. 922 Cleveland St.
West Hemp., N. Y. IVanhoe 1-3673

KENDALE

2 Hrs. N.Y.C. — So. Windham Connecticut

Co-ed 6-15, 27th Season. Pvt. Lake

$500 — All Land & Water Sports Tennis, Trips, Sailing, Music, Nature, Dramatics, Crafts.

PYramid 1-5810, Mitchell Strauss
954 Glenridge Ave., North Woodmere, N.Y.

PINE TRAIL

co-ed 7-14

Pine Bush, N. Y. 70 miles from N. Y.C.

General program geared to the interests of the individual campers. Limited enrollment 4, 8 weeks. A.C.A. member.
36 Quail Dr., Brentwood, L.I., N.Y. BR 3-9785

(Continued from Preceding Page)

found a lot of sympathy in the Midwest for our position, particularly in regard to our respect for states' rights and the Tenth Amendment," said one returning missionary.

What underlies this refusal of white Mississippians to face reality? Undoubtedly, the heritage of slavery, the stark poverty and profound isolation that Mississippi has known have played a part. Another important factor has been the fear of the Negro felt by what until recently was a white minority.

THERE is also bitter resentment against the North. This was first aroused by abolitionism and reinforced by the North's failure to follow a consistent racial policy, either in its demands made upon the South or in its handling of the problem in its own backyard. In a word, Mississippians consider Northerners hypocritical.

The genesis of the current agony, of course, lies in the school-desegregation decision of the Supreme Court. Dr. C. Vann Woodward, an authority on the history of the post-Civil War South, has written that Mississippi came forward in 1954 "in her historic role as leader of reaction in race policy, just as she had in 1875 to overthrow Reconstruction and in 1890 to disfranchise the Negro."

Significantly, many of the state's present leaders—Governor Barnett, House Speaker Walter Sillers and Senator James O. Eastland—grew up in the climate of reaction created by those earlier benchmarks of Southern democracy. And they served their political apprenticeships in the school of Senators James K. Vardaman, "The Great White Chief," who advocated repeal of the 15th Amendment as the first step toward saving Anglo-Saxon civilization, and Theodore G. Bilbo, known as "The Man," who plumbed the depths of demagoguery.

Raw material from this background combined with the catalyst of the court's desegregation ruling to touch off a racial conflagration. The first alarm was sounded in the Delta county of Sunflower, home of Senator Eastland, in the summer of 1954 when the first Citizens Council was founded. This was the initial step toward institutionalized bigotry in a more or less respectable setting.

There followed a campaign of indoctrination with few parallels in American history. The results have been described by Dr. James W. Silver, professor of history at the University of Mississippi, in The New Mexico Electric News: "Most organizations and individuals (press, pulpit, politicians, patriots, philosophers) capable of influencing public opinion are militantly arrayed in the indoctrination process. A never-ceasing propagation of the 'true faith' goes on day after day. The constant demand, particularly in emergencies, for a united front requires that potential nonconformists and dissenters from the accepted code be kept under wraps, squelched, or, in extreme cases, run out of the community."

WHAT happens to those who dissent is shown by the case of Ira Harkey, editor and publisher of The Chronicle at Pascagoula. Harkey who resembles a low-key Jimmy Cagney, holds that the rights of every man should be protected, "whether he be white, black, yellow, green or shades in between." One of his most biting editorial commentaries on the Mississippi scene followed publication of a letter from a relative of Governor Barnett who is a missionary in Africa. She criticized Mississippians for sending persons to minister to Negroes abroad and then undercutting the missionaries by mistreating Negroes at home. To this, The Chronicle said:

"In Mississippi, a person who attempts to carry Christianity out the church door, who dares to practice the Christian virtue of tolerance outside the church, is cursed as a liberal, a leftist, a Communist, a Niggerlover. Christ was the greatest champion of the underdog the world has ever known. If He were to visit us here, now, by whose side would He stand, beside the brick-throwing, foul-mouthed,

(Continued on Following Page)

PICTURE CREDITS

1—Calogero Cascio from Rapho-Guillumette
9—Marc Riboud from Magnum
10-11—The New York Times (Tames, Burns, Orris); AP; Camera Press, Dalmas and Baldev from Pix; European; UPI; Pictorial Parade; CBS-TV; China Photo Service
13—United Press International
14-15—UPI: National Science Foundation; Drawing by Walter Hortens
16—General Dynamics
18—Dalmas-Pix
19—The New York Times (Sam Falk)
20—Drawing by Walter Einsel
24-25—Crispian Woodgate
34—Cinema Studios
39—Culver Pictures
40—Fred Fehl
42-50—Drawings by Arnold Genkins
52—Lew Merrim from Monkmeyer
62—Steve Schapiro from Black Star
64—George Zimbel
69—Henri Dauman
70—Associated Press
72-79—Drawings by Roy Doty
82—Fritz Garo
89—Eve Hoffmann; Suzanne Szasz; Jack Manning
90—The New York Times (Sam Falk)
92—Drawing by Alice Golden
100—Bettmann Archive
101—Culver Pictures
108-109—Talon, Inc.
111-112—Ben Roth Agency
114-115—Sovfoto

NEW MISSISSIPPI — Factories like this are springing up.

destroying, profaning, slavering members of the mob and their 'nice-folk' eggers-on, or beside the trembling victim of their hate?"

Harkey's rewards have included a bullet through The Chronicle's front door, a shotgun blast through his office window, an advertising boycott, "hate" mail and social ostracism.

Other dissenters who have broken the silence imposed by fear or expediency have received similar treatment. Among them are Methodist ministers who have lost their pulpits, students who have been hounded out of the University of Mississippi for befriending James Meredith, and faculty members such as G. Ray Kerciu, an assistant professor of art who was threatened with penalties totaling seven months' imprisonment and $600 in fines for a painting inspired by the Ole Miss riots.

There is no ready panacea for the social ills that afflict Mississippi. But there is hope. The pressure on Mr. Harkey has been eased since Claude Ramsay, the bluff president of the state A.F.L.-C.I.O., and a handful of others came to his support. The charges against Mr. Kerciu have been dropped.

And there are other harbingers of a new day: voting applicants standing patiently at the courthouse door in Greenwood for hour on endless hour, a Justice Department attorney shaking hands with a Negro while a white woman shivers with rage, the songs of freedom rolling out of the little Negro churches into the blackness of the Delta night, and a white man, trapped by a system he inherited, smiling sadly and saying, "We would like to be more responsible than we can afford to be."

Sitting in his modernistic office overlooking Jackson, a prominent lawyer spoke of the state's responsible citizens and their weariness with racism and its fruits. "The human mind can accept just so much of this type of thing, then it seeks relief," he said.

Former Congressman Frank Smith of Greenwood gave voice to the sentiments of this group as he left office. "We cannot isolate ourselves from the rest of the United States any more than the United States can isolate itself from the world. . . . Our racial problems are going to remain for years to come. But the most certain thing about them is that any remedies based on hate will merely aggravate the problems instead of simplifying them."

It is questionable that Mississippians are yet prepared to heed the advice of Mr. Smith, now a director of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The state will elect a new Governor next fall, and it now appears that another member of the Vardaman-Bilbo school will succeed Barnett.

The most effective influence could be exerted by industrialists and financiers outside the state, although they are traditionally hesitant to become involved in such matters. Indeed, concern over the possible harmful effects of the controversy already has led some prominent Mississippi businessmen to exert pressure for moderation.

It seems evident that Mississippi cannot long delay some compromise with the legitimate demands of its Negro citizens. The hazards of the present situation are implicit in the mounting evidence of widespread bitterness. In the crowded sanctuary of a Negro church one warm spring night, a speaker at a voter registration rally referred with sarcasm to "the good white people." A voice from the audience shouted: "They ain't no good! None of them!"

CAMPS

CO-EDUCATIONAL

NAVAJO Boys & Girls Ages 5-17.
Poconos, 100 Miles N.Y.C. 47th Yr.
Honesdale, Pa. Approved
SUMMER CAMP
Comprehensive Program for All Ages, Interests Activities Famous Sports Clinics for All Land & Lake Water Sports. Horseback Riding, Water Skiing, Sailing, Golf, Tennis, Riflery, Archery, Drama, Dance, Music, Choral, Guitar, Roller Skating. Special Sciences, Labs, Shops, Art, Radio, Crafts, Pioneering Trips, Special Events for the Beginner, Intermediate & Advanced Camper, Teen, Trainee & Work Camp.
SUMMER SCHOOL (Optional)
On the Premises, Full Home School Credit, Licensed All Subjects, Grades 1-12, Repeat, Advance, Tutor; Review, Preview, Rem & Dev Reading, Math, Sciences, Languages, etc., Prep Conditionals, Advance College Placement, Scholastic Aptitudes, College Entrance Exam Review, Official August College Boards, Typing, PLUS Camp Program.
H. T. FEDERMAN, Dir.
135 Eastern Pkwy, B'klyn 38, N. Y.
Phone Area Code 212-STerling3-2217

LAKE FAIRLEE CAMP
Ely, Vermont

Boys-Girls: 7-14+
A Unique atmosphere and environment. All Athletics and Aquatics: Tennis, softball, Swimming, Water-skiing, etc. plus optional instruction by professional artists in the Fine Arts. Trips, chores, visiting faculty. Dietary laws. Outstanding staff for Creative Program.
Fee: $675. for 8 weeks
Write/Phone: Herb Kummel, Dir.
408 West 57th St., New York 19
JUdson 6-5710

UNDER-ACHIEVED CHILDREN 7 to 16 Vernon, Conn.
Unique design to accelerate social, emotional and academic development. Individual and small group techniques. Remediation in reading, speech, science, social relations. Full recreation, athletic, cultural program. Spacious quarters on 30 acres overlooking lake. Dr. M. Kaufman, Psychologist, 230 Hilton Ave., Hempstead, N. Y. Phone IV 1-7713.

GARFIELD CAMP SCHOOL

IF YOU ARE . . . 13th yr.
16-18 YEARS OF AGE
Have a wonderful summer at a Co-ed
WORK CAMP
Fee $175 plus transp.
Write for information to:
American Jewish Society for Service
Room 1516, 120 Broadway, N. Y. 5, N. Y.

CHIC-A-LAC
Youngsville, N. Y.
Co-ed 6-15 99 miles from N.Y.C.
Fee $550—no extras
An unforgettable camping adventure directed by Carl Meltzer, world traveler winner of high honors for "dedicated work for children." Write for Booklet T.
Box 28, Cooper Sta., NYC. GR 3-2748
A Children's Paradise

Psychologically Oriented
CAMP BEAUMONT Boys & Girls
Hopewell, N.J. 6 to 16
For the child of average to superior intelligence and sensitivity who needs assistance in order to achieve optimal personal growth, social adjustment, and a happy summer at camp. Full camp program, professonal staff.
Dr. GERALD BURDAY 47 E. 67th St.
Executive Director N.Y. 21, N.Y.
YU 8-4800

Job's Pond in Vermont
Teenagers: Varied work projects & activities; forestry, riding, tennis, sailing, trips, etc. 400 acres with 50 acre lake. If you have imagination & initiative and want to assume responsibility and have a wonderful summer, phone 914 GR 8-1650.
H. T. Jayson, 49 Villard, Hastings-on-Hudson, NY

NEW YORK STATE CHILDREN'S CAMP have everything
Write for 1963 FREE directory.
New York State Camp Directors Ass'n
Box 723, Ansonia Sta., New York City 23

CO-EDUCATIONAL

HABONIM CAMPS
ADVENTURE in CREATIVE Jewish CAMPING
ISRAELI PROGRAM
DISCUSSION GROUPS
ALL SPORTS
SWIMMING-BOATING
SCOUTING-HIKING
EXPERIENCED LEADERS
DIETARY LAWS
TUITION $450.00
CAMP KVUTZA GALIL
Ottsville, Pennsylvania
Office: 511 Fox Building, Phila. 3, Pa.
HABONIM CAMP MOSHAVA
(rate $375)
Annapolis, Maryland
Office: 3303 W. Rogers Ave., Baltimore 15, Md.
HABONIM CAMP NAALEH
Red Hook, New York
Office: 200 Park Ave. S. New York 3, N. Y.
HABONIM CAMP TEL ARI
Hunter, New York
Office: 200 Park Ave. S. New York 3, N. Y.
—30 YEARS' EXPERIENCE IN JEWISH CAMPING—

Nothing Finer CAMP MONROE Only 40 mi. N.Y.C.
BETTER TYPE CAMP FOR BOYS & GIRLS . . . AGES 6-16
250 ACRES

Private Lake with beautiful OLYMPIC POOL, requiring NO Chlorination. All Land & Water Sports, including Boating, Canoeing, Water Skiing, Water Bicycling, Canoe Trips & Trout Fishing. ALL POPULAR ARTS & RECREATIONS including Drama, Oil Painting, Electronics, Miniature Sports Car Driving, Bowling; NO EXTRA CHARGES FOR HORSEBACK RIDING & WEEKLY BUS TRIPS FOR ALL. Mature, Experenced Staff; 2 RN.s and M.D. on premises. Kosher Cuisine. REQUEST FREE BOOKLET.
HERB PORT Director. • 1330 52nd Street, Brooklyn 19, N.Y. • Phone ULster 1-6800

CHILDREN'S CC COLONY
CHILDREN'S COLONY BERKSHIRE CAMP Juniors, Seniors 6-10
Pre-Teeners, Teeners 11-15
CHILDREN'S COLONY INTERNATIONAL CAMP
One or two months of ideal camp life on private mountain lake at the unsurpassed site of the former Cedar's Country Club in Lakeville, Connecticut.
Complete, well-rounded program with special emphasis on watersports, music. French and preparation for travel abroad.
COOPERATIVE STUDY TRIP TO THE UNIVERSITY OF GRENOBLE, FRANCE High School French Students 15-17
439 West End Avenue, New York 24, N. Y., Trude Frank, Dir. TRafalgar 3-8695

Camp Crestwood On our own "Spring Lake" Southington, Conn. Boys & Girls, 5 to 16 years.
Two separate camps within walking distance. CITY WATER SUPPLY for all purposes. HORSE-BACK RIDING & WATER SKIING daily. All land and water sports. Dance • Dramatics • Music • Trampoline • Typing • Guitar • Arts-Crafts • Weekly trips to places of interest • Pioneering • Golf • Bowling • New OLYMPIC POOL • Skilled staff, physician, 2 nurses, 2 camp mothers. Friendly individual attention by directors & staff. FEE: $635, incl.
E. & L. GURLITZ, 282 Beaumont St., Bklyn, NY. DE 2-4619 or DE 2-2842

STISSING LAKE CAMPS
90 MILES N.Y.C. — THE GATEWAY TO THE BERKSHIRES
• Established 1921
• Cabins w/showers
• Own Horses, Trails
• Res. Doctor & RNs
• Boys-Girls from 5 to 17 (CIT-CW)
• Separate Campuses, Mile Lake, Ski
• AllLand-Water Sports, Tanglewood
• Mature Staff, Jewish-Amer. Cuisine
For brochure: call or write: Phone: SC 3-6740
Norman B. Weingrow, B.S., M.A.
70 Stratton Rd., Scarsdale, N.Y.

WOOD ROCK 2 Hrs. from N.Y.C. in Catskills
3 wks. . . . . $150
5 wks. . . . . 240
8 wks. . . . . 375
CO-ED — 130 CAMPERS (5-15) • FILTERED OLYMPIC POOL
Delicious Cuisine • Mdrn. Plumbing & Showers • All Sports • Infirmary & Reg. R. N., Mature Staff, Swim Inst., Baseball, Basketball, Skating, Riding Program, Arts & Crafts, Trips, Riflery, Tennis, Dramatics, Nature, Music.
CAMP OPEN FOR INSPECTION ALL YEAR ROUND
Children's Camps, Box 541; W. Englewood, N. J.
Call anytime PE 6-6280; N. J. TE 7-7119
MEMBER AMER. CAMP'G ASS'N

CATHOLIC CAMPS
Rev. John T. Ravo
472 West 142 St.
New York 31
Phone WA 6-5840
OUR LADY OF LOURDES • CAMP ACADIA
Girls 6-18 Boys 6-18
Separate camps for boys and girls one mile apart. 1600 acres in Catskills. 2 private lakes. Superb equipment. Excellent cuisine. Mature staff. 57th year. Resident priests, doctor, nurses. $475 full season. $265 one month. Catalog.
RIDING • WATER SKIING • FIELD HOCKEY
TENNIS • HIKING • CRAFTS • WEEKLY DANCES
BASKETBALL • BOATING • TUTORING

NAODEB
MILESES, N.Y.
For Boys and Girls 6 to 16.
All land and water sports with exclusive, unique personalized program. Horses. Moderate fee. 8 wks. (Limited number of 4 wk. enrollments available.) Brochure on request, no obligation.
P.O. Box 91, Eastchester, N.Y. WO 1-9333

TO-LOA
A PLATEAU ON A MT. IN THE POCONOS
Boys & girls, 6-15. All sports: swimming, canoeing, tennis, golf, basketball, baseball. Trips, crafts, music. Riding—own horses, stables, ring, trails.
Modern cabins—showers. No poison ivy.
Private spring-fed lake. Pollen free.
257 acres at 2000 ft. Teaneck 7-3295
No mosquitoes. 448-2789.
Irv Irwin, 837 Barbara Drive, Teaneck, N. J.

WOODCLIFF Woodstock, N. Y. area Coed 5-17
Relaxed atmosphere, res. M. D., private lake, RIDING, jumping, horseshow camp horses READING, math, study skills. Accelerated and remedial. Specialized teaching tools WATER SKIING. land and water sports. Golf, tennis, archery, riflery. Dance, drama, art. Trips, pioneering nature. 914 WO 1-3786
R. T. Saphir, 62 Howard Avenue, Tuckahoe 7, N. Y.

Alderkill
Boys & Girls 6-15 Est. 1938
Daily riding, swimming, shop, pets, dancing. Baseball & tennis teams. Emphasis on individual ability. Jr. & Sr. groups. 135 acres. 90 mi. from N. Y. Appts. at camp or NYC. Catalogue. S. T. Dresser, Rhinebeck, N. Y.
Trinity 6-4783 (please call Operator)

HOW 90,000 MISSISSIPPI NEGROES DEFIED RACISTS TO CAST UNOFFICIAL BALLOTS

The Freedom Voters triumph over terror

By Len Holt
Special to the Guardian

JACKSON, MISS.

THE MESSAGE of the Mississippi Freedom Vote campaign Nov. 2-5 in which about 90,000 Negroes marked unofficial ballots for a biracial slate for governor and lieutenant governor is that the disenfranchised Negro will vote, despite threats and mobs and police harassment, if he is legally permitted to do so.

Aaron Henry, Negro Freedom Vote candidate for governor, added to that message to Missisippians and the rest of the nation a variation on the Biblical parable of Esther: "If you continue to remain quiet at a time like this, God's going to find another way to deliver his people." Robert Moses, campaign manager, said after the results were announced that while the returns demonstrated the Negro's desire to vote, it was clear that the Mississippi Negro would not get to vote "until the equivalent of an army is sent there." He added: "No political machinery of this country will do this until there is pressure from all over the country."

Henry's running mate was Rev. Edwin King, a native, white Mississippian who is dean of students and chaplain at Tougaloo College in Jackson, Miss. King's campaign photos show a bandage which covers facial scars and a pencil-size hole in his jaw from an auto "accident." In a Mississippi drawl he confesses "I'm scared as hell." These are his words. His conduct differs. He has the arrest and beating record typical of so many in the civil rights struggle.

DIRTY CAMPAIGN: The Freedom Vote campaigners refused to stoop to racial epithets, but this was far from the case in the Republican and Democratic race. Rubel Phillips, over television, radio and in the press, vied with his Democratic foe, Paul Johnson, in what seemed to be the only issue in their campaign: Who hated the Negro most? Republican Phillips' campaign workers were threatened by Democratic officials of the state government with loss of contracts and jobs for supporting him. Phillips told a Clarion-Ledger reporter that a South Mississippi banker had been warned by the state bank comptroller, Llewellyn Brown, that "his bank would suffer if he did not remove a Phillips campaign poster from his yard." Phillips said that Rep. Walter Hester had been "on the telephone every day" using his influence as a member of the General Legislative Investigation Committee to pressure state employes and businessmen into "supporting all Democratic Party nominees." The cars of three campaign workers were doused with acid while they attended a precinct meeting. Phillips was quoted as saying: "They are treating my workers like niggers."

THE FREEDOM CANDIDATES: THEY LED A GRIM CAMPAIGN
The votes piled up, despite harassment by the police

TERROR AND VIOLENCE: The Freedom Ballot project was conducted by the Mississippi Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), composed of local civil rights groups and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Congress of Racial Equality, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

COFO had hoped that between 100,000 and 200,000 Negroes over the age of 21 who live in Mississippi would cast ballots. There are more than 400,000 Negroes of voting age in the state. The difference between the goal and the number of votes cast can be attributed to white harassment and violence inflicted on campaign workers.

One of the purposes of the Freedom Vote was to expose the lie in the assertion that the Negroes of Mississippi didn't want to vote. Another aim was to provide a choice for the adult Negroes of Mississippi among three parties: Republican—which ran Rubel Phillips for governor and Stanford Morse for lieutenant governor; Democratic, with Paul Johnson and Carroll Gartin as candidates, and the Freedom Party, backing Henry and King. Freedom Ballots listed all the candidates—official and unofficial—in alphabetical order. Less than 300 persons voted for each of the segregationist candidates. In the official election Johnson received 192,000 votes to defeat Phillips, with 118,000.

COURT ACTION: A week before the Freedom Party mock voting was to take place, the City of Jackson began pressing in the Chancery Court of Hinds County for a permanent injunction to bar all civil rights organizations from the state, in the same manner in which Alabama has barred the NAACP for almost seven years. Police began following cars going to and from COFO's campaign headquarters on Lynch St., Jackson. The campaign of terror and harrassment was under way.

Henry, King and Moses, Mississippi SNCC project director, are generally considered to be prime targets of racists. They are part of what was once a hated quartet. A fatal bullet through the back of Medgar Evers, state field secretary of the NAACP, reduced the size of the "wanted list." On this list one is not wanted "dead or alive"—just dead.

The current sick joke in the Movement relates to the best "get-rich-quick scheme in America"—an insurance policy on Henry, King or Moses.

Henry is a 41-year old Negro pharmacist who operates a drug store in his home town of Clarksdale, Miss., despite both "legal" and illegal threats to his life and his livelihood. On appeal are at least six criminal convictions with penalties of six years in the Parchman state penitentiary and one civil judgment of $43,000. Henry was recently acquitted on a ludicrous sodomy charge, but a retrial has been ordered.

GRIM REALITY: The Freedom Vote campaign was everything but "mock." There was a grim realness about bullets and stones directed at campaign workers. In one case a highway patrolman placed a cocked pistol at the head of SNCC's Ivanhoe Donaldson when he gave the "wrong" answer to the question asked by the cop: "Ain't white folks better'n niggers?"

There were more than 200 incidents of harassment and arrests by cops. Persons were jailed on such varied charges as parking more than 18 inches from the curb, passing bad checks and sodomy. The limits on the police seemed to be their imagination.

The voters, too, risked some of the violence directed at the candidates and campaign workers. In Biloxi the windows of United Church of Christ's Back Bay Mission were broken by a crowd which stoned the building during a campaign meeting. Henry said the building was "under siege" and police in the crowd just watched. "The cops," he said, "were there to prevent us from retaliating against them."

A Hattiesburg meeting was surrounded by fire trucks and firemen and police marched into the church. Votemobiles were watched by police so that local whites could keep tabs on who participated in the balloting. Police made it clear to voters in Yazoo City that they would suffer later.

THE PLATFORM: The candidates ran on a platform which covered freedom, voting and justice for Negroes, and gave detailed attention to the economics of Mississippi. There were comments on the problem created by the almost total subsidization of the large planters by the federal government. These large planters take over the small farms, displacing both owners and workers. The platform of the Freedom Vote Party urged such things as:

- Long-term, low-interest loans for farms less than 300 acres in size.
- Government assistance in the creation of cooperatives for small farmers.
- Public works programs to relieve unemployment and improve communities.
- Minimum wages of $1.25 an hour and a maximum work-week of 40 hours.
- Fair employment practices in hiring, with penalties for those not complying.

The last three planks of the platform are more than academic. Mississippi is expanding rapidly as an industrial state. Jesse Morris, SNCC field worker, said: "It's near impossible for an industry to stay out of here. They are offered free land for building factories and homes, state-constructed access roads if needed, low-interest loans, 10-15 years of tax exemptions and the cheapest non-union labor in America."

Henry described Mississippi schools thus: "No matter how many states join the union, Mississippi is always last. When there were 48 states, Mississippi was 48th. Now that there are 50, Mississippi is 50th in educational achievement.

It doesn't matter how bad the schools are so long as the white school is better than the colored one."

STUDENTS AID: There are 82 counties in Mississippi. Each is an island unto itself, with its own corrupt rulers who ape the tactics of the state leaders. Not one of the 82 counties was left untouched by the Freedom Vote Ballot campaign.

Sixty Yale University students and 30 Stanford University students came to Mississippi to work in the campaign. They joined 49 SNCC workers (boys and girls paid $9.64 a week) and six CORE field workers, thus making almost 150 full-time persons working in the state for the two weeks immediately prior to the end of the campaign. They were assisted by about 300 part-time workers.

All canvassed, got names, placed Freedom Ballot boxes in churches, stores, lodge halls and homes, worked long hours. They ate salt pork, grits, and greens. They slept in basements, in trucks and even in the woods.

The students stood tall, and took everything that was dished out to the SNCC workers with them. An example of their steadfastness was the behavior of Bruce Paine. Beaten in Natchez, Miss., one day, he insisted on returning the next day with George Green of SNCC. They were stopped and shot at three times.

Paine wondered aloud: "Do you think those two fellows really intended to kill us? Those bullets did hit the car sorta low." King responded "It is error to confuse good intentions with poor aim."

At the victory rally Nov. 4 in the Masonic Temple in Jackson (where Medgar Evers's funeral was held) Moses said: "We don't expect to correct the evils of Mississippi by this snail's-pace voting registration, but we do expect to build enough pressure to make it politically impossible for a federal government to remain so indifferent.

"We expect our efforts to dissuade those who believe that anything less than federal troops will work."

productivity — then they will produce the same number of bobby pins at roughly the same cost and unit costs will not rise.

Thus one way to cut hours and avoid the cost difficulties is to spread the reduction in hours over several years. Instead of dropping hours from forty to thirty-five in one jump and increasing hourly pay rates by 14.3 per cent (as shown in the table), do it over a period of around five years. Of course, the impact will be different on some individual firms and industries than on others because of individual differences in productivity, cost structure and peculiarities in equipment, methods and products. But average unit costs in the nation should stay relatively stable.

Yet two important caveats remain even under these conditions. Keeping the decline in hours in line with productivity gains would tend to make existing jobs more secure and might require hiring new workers to increase production, but it is possible that the new workers required could be obtained from new entrants into the labor force so that no dent would be made in existing unemployment. Other measures would then be required to cut the existing unemployment rate. The hours reduction would serve only to keep the rate from rising. And to be sure that new workers instead of overtime hours were added in order to raise output, it might be necessary to raise the penalty overtime rate—say from time-and-a-half to double time for overtime.

A second important caveat is this: there is strong pressure in this country for increases in wage rates when unemployment declines and output approaches capacity. Yet it would be necessary to forgo wage hikes at a time when hours were being cut if stable unit costs were to be maintained. Thus some type of formal or informal agreement between labor, management and perhaps the President would be necessary to prevent wage rates from rising, the President bringing the full weight of public opinion to bear on any offending union or other group of workers. And no one can be sure, of course, that this type of arrangement would be completely successful. Hence we have another of the many uncertainties associated with workweek legislation.

Whether or not the standard workweek is indeed reduced in the next few years will be dependent in large measure upon the success of the President's tax reduction proposal. Will it pass? Will the resulting increase in expenditures be sufficient to create employment opportunities for an expanding labor force and to reduce the present unemployment rate? If not, the pressure for a workweek reduction may become irresistible.

Most economists agree that the workweek will probably decline in the long run. For the fundamental advance in technical know-how is rendering the labor force increasingly productive, and we will probably desire more leisure to enjoy the goods we produce.

If the tax reduction is indeed unsuccessful in getting unemployment down to tolerable levels, then it would seem desirable in the short run to implement what we expect in the long run—to reduce the workweek, providing we can keep the cut in line with productivity gains and keep a lid on wage demands.

Mississippi

The Nation 12/7/63

UNDERGROUND ELECTION . . . Jeannine Herron

Suff. Miss.

Jackson, Miss.

Bullets, beatings, arrests and fines drove the campaign of Aaron Henry, a Negro, for Governor "underground" as the 1963 gubernatorial campaign neared a climax in Mississippi. The outrageously "uppity" plan for a mock campaign of unregistered Negro voters to dramatize the flagrant totalitarianism of Southern politics was taken seriously by the white power structure. As a result of this, harassment and intimidation plagued Henry's campaign workers all over the state.

Despite the unexpected severity of these difficulties and a disappointing blackout by local news and national wire services, the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) polled a highly significant 82,000 votes. COFO (consisting of NAACP, SCLC, CORE and SNCC), working on a state-wide project for the first time, managed to total the margin of difference between the Republican and Democratic votes in only three weeks of campaigning.

Two things undoubtedly worried Southern traditionalists. First, the integrated ticket — Dr. Aaron Henry, a Negro pharmacist, and Reverend Edwin King, white Tougaloo College chaplain — confounded their argument that Negroes, if allowed to vote, would "take over" the state.

Second, the platform of the Freedom Party raised issues at the heart of the depressing problems in Mississippi, a state that seems to rank fiftieth in almost every field. It is unprecedented to speak of justice, free elections, economics and education even in a game of "Let's Pretend We Have the Vote." In the official gubernatorial race. Rubel Phillips, the first Republican candidate since Reconstruction, repeated monotonously, "K.O. the Ken-nedys!" while Paul Johnson's Democratic pamphlet warned darkly, "DANGER, Two party system in Mississippi would END OUR WAY OF LIFE. Vote November 5 to stamp out Republicanism!"

Jeannine Herron is a free-lance writer in Jackson, Miss., who has been active in civil rights and the peace movement for several years.

But the final tally for Henry and King proved that Negroes are capable and willing to engage in the political affairs of their state, that they are vitally interested in a better society for all Mississippians and that they will have even greater resistance to overcome before the make-believe becomes real.

The unusual protest technique of a "mock ballot" was augmented and modified by the flexibility of such resourceful leaders as Robert Moses, campaign manager, in meeting unpredictable problems. In areas where threats had genuinely frightened local leaders and no churches or stores were available for polling places, he contrived "votemobiles," mobile ballot boxes carried in cars by campaign teams. Where even votemobiles were forced out and ballots confiscated, the campaign encouraged underground ballots, or mail-in votes. The committee made skillful use of an amazing contingent of more than seventy-five out-of-state students, mostly from Yale, who joined local workers to canvass and poll nearly every little town in the state.

The power of local authorities in exercising their whims was effective insofar as it kept the Negroes from realizing their goal of 200,000 votes. Nearly everyone actively working on the campaign was arrested, detained or fined. There were at least seventy arrests for everything from littering and vagrancy to sodomy. Bonds went as high as $1,000 for fictitious traffic violations. With only three or four lawyers daring to take civil-rights cases in all of Mississippi, several cases that should have been appealed were not contested. Had Negro citizens been free of fear, the vote most surely would have been doubled.

Among the particularly hazardous areas was Natchez. Bruce Payne, a Yale student, was pulled out of his votemobile and beaten by four white men in a gas station. They warned him to "stay out of Natchez." The next day Payne and George Greene, a SNCC worker, were forced off the road by the same men. Making a crucial decision, Greene reversed suddenly and got back onto the highway as three shots hit the car, one puncturing a tire. Speeding away on the slowly leaking tire, he somehow managed to lose his pursuers. The following day, in the same area, another votemobile was chased at speeds up to 115 mph.

In Picayune, three Hattiesburg Negroes and two white Yale students were detained by police for questioning. When they returned to their car, they found the gas tank full of water. The local garage could not repair the damage. A crowd of men and boys followed them while they hired a car and driver to take them out of town. Police and members of the crowd stopped the car north of Poplarville, and officials took the driver away in their car. In the confusion one boy was separated from the others and walked from 1 to 7 A.M. when he was picked up by a SNCC search car. The other four finally managed to flag down a Greyhound bus, which took them to New Orleans.

It took remarkable courage to enter a town like Belzoni where two Negroes have been shot in the last eight years for registering to vote. Willie James Shaw (they call him "preacher Shaw" at SNCC) was not going to be turned around. He sat on the hood of his votemobile and started singing freedom songs. The local Negroes stood in a silent, fearful group, not daring to vote in the presence of several police officers. Then Shaw got angry and began to preach.

"What's wrong with you? Negro, don't you know you got nothing left to lose? White man's got everything. Stand up and tell that white man you gonna be FREE!" The atmosphere of fear got thicker, but Willie preached on, seeming to have mesmerized himself, the crowd and the police. Then, miraculously, two women and a little girl joined Willie's singing. One by one they began to vote. Thirty-eight ballots were polled for Henry and King in Belzoni, but the police confiscated them as they took Willie off to jail for parking too close to a fire hydrant.

It may have all been make-believe, but both sides read it as a true story and as a portent of the future. Although the outcome of the Freedom Campaign had no effect on the actual gubernatorial race, the image of thousands of Negroes casting ballots for the first time for candidates they believed in could not be taken lightly by the white elite. With the issue of schools looming ahead next year they will let no challenge go by without battle. Their frantic efforts to submerge a mock campaign reveal their fear. They have left hasty, inadequate trenches behind them as they have backed away.

The confusion of a retreat sometimes leaves little time for consideration of where the next line should be drawn. Desperation and impotence create poignantly humorous scenes, such as the public library in Selma, Ala., that has no chairs, or the benchless Jackson zoo. In some places where selective buying is crippling local businesses, the Citizens Councils are threatening anti-boycott boycotts.

The campaign had its moments too. A votemobile driver so infuriated a state trooper that in a dramatic seizure of frustration he snatched the boy's license and scrawled "AGGITATER" across it. Several times students were arrested for resisting arrest. No other charge. In Hattiesburg, police tried various means of stopping a campaign rally. After sulking because they could not tell the difference between Yalies and local whites, they triumphantly decided to admit only whites who could produce Yale I.D. cards! Outside, in a final burst of petulance, they blew horns and fire sirens to drown out the speaker, but Aaron Henry broke his rhythm only long enough to shout, "There's a fire burning in here, all right, but those firemen will NEVER put it out." The sirens were silenced by cheers.

Norman Thomas, who spoke for the Freedom Party in Greenwood, and who narrowly escaped harassment himself, summed it up in a letter to President Kennedy: "We have in Mississippi a state obsessed with maintenance of segregation in support of white supremacy. It is a religion which, like communism to its believers, cleanses and sanctifies lies, perjury, perversion of law, perhaps even murder to maintain itself. This situation is America's business. I do not write as a sensationalist but as a veteran campaigner who has frequently covered the United States without finding a parallel or precedent for what I found in Mississippi."

Memo FROM THE DESK OF PAUL RILLING

WB ✓

KJ ✓

PA ✓

MJ - file

STUDENT NONVIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE
8 1/2 Raymond Street NW
Atlanta, Georgia

file

SNCC'S EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM

ITS GOALS AND NEEDS

The needs of the young people who work with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in the south, and the populace with whom they work, makes the development of a comprehensive educational program imperative.

During the past three years, more than 200 young men and women have interrupted their education at various levels--high school, college, graduate school--to devote themselves to the task of securing basic rights for Negroes in the South. While they have benefitted from their commitment to bettering the security of their fellow men, they have sacrificed important elements of education and socialization found in formal academic settings. Secondly, through the efforts of these students, the barriers of a destructive educational system which has been sanctioned by the political enforcement of the South is beginning to break. Now a constructive program is needed to deal specifically with southern educational problems.

For these reasons, SNCC has set certain goals. First, to realize their full potential by combining social involvement and intellectual growth for members of the SNCC staff. And secondly, to provide the information, education and motivational services needed by the people in the South.

While the organization has already received impressive assistance with forming the program for this project, it must raise $332,912 to implement it. This proposal outlines our educational program and deals specifically with the funds needed to put it into effect.

ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF

A full time staff is needed to coordinate and administer this program. It should include two professors who will be responsible for program content, development of materials and training of teachers and workshop leaders. These professors should receive salaries equal to those received for their previous year's teaching. Four graduate students and four teacher trainees are also needed to implement the training of the teaching staff and to lead conferences and discussion groups. Their salaries should be equal to what they would receive as graduate assistants, perhaps on the basis of scholarships for returning to school at the end of the year. Adequate secretarial staff and office space must also be acquired.

Total money needed for Administrative Staff is $37,112.

WORK-STUDY PROJECTS

In the fall of 1963, SNCC initiated work-study projects at Tougaloo College in Jackson, Mississippi, and Miles College in Birmingham, Alabama. Twenty students took leave of absence from their college careers to participate in a program which alternated between field work in the civil rights movement and a study program of readings, discussions and lectures.

Unlike work-study plans with formal academic programs, such as the one at Antioch College, no academic credits were granted with this project. The students were given subsistance pay by SNCC when working in the field. An educational grant of $30,000 was split between the two colleges, with $10,000 covering educational activities during this year. A $1,000 scholarship is guaranteed to each student for return to formal college training at Tougaloo and Miles in the fall of 1964.

Three additional colleges wish to begin similar programs in the school year of 1964-65. Plans now call for a series of two to six week study periods during this year for work-study students. They will spend the remainder of the year working in the rural South, and will return to the colleges for formal matriculation with $1,000 scholarships in the fall of 1965.

A grant of $75,000 is needed for this educational program and for the return-to-school scholarships.

FREEDOM SCHOOLS

Twenty day schools and two resident schools are being planned for the Mississippi Summer Project. The day schools will accomodate about fifty students each, and will run for three weeks. One resident school is designed to help high school dropouts in Mississippi, and the other is for students who have shown leadership ability. Up to two hundred students will attend each six week session, to live and study in a college-like atmosphere.

All the schools will have a high teacher-student ratio. Professional teachers are being recruited by Professional Teachers Associations, the National Council of Churches, the Presbyterian Church and other institutions with educational resources. Non-professional teaching assistants, who will include nurses and dieticians, will be selected from applicants for the Mississippi Summer Project.

The Freedom School curriculum will be geared to challenging the students' curiosity about the world, giving him a better image of himself and his Negro heritage, and teaching basic literary skills. Students will study problem areas, specific incidents close to their own experiences, and the basic tenets of a democratic society. A multi-dimensional, integrated program is designed to overcome some of the students' problems of retention and concentration resulting from their usually deprived educational experiences.

The total cost of the Freedom School program is $114,100.

SCHOLARSHIPS

Southern students who want to work with SNCC's summer program are faced with the fact that they must earn between three and five hundred dollars over the summer in order to return to school in the fall. It is essential that these students be able to participate in SNCC's projects this summer, since they are the nucleus of leadership throughout the South. We cannot ask these people to work with us unless we can provide them with scholarships for their return to school in the fall. Minimum aid for 100 students will require $30,000 by September, 1964.

Scholarship funds are needed for the 95 members of the SNCC staff who have been unable to enter or complete their college work. SNCC's program has been made possible because of the committment of these students. But they must return to school for the education they need to maintain their effectiveness. To provide full scholarships for at least 30 staff members this fall, a minimum of $60,000 is needed.

Tax exempt contributions toward this scholarship program can be made to SNCC through the National Council of Negro Women.

STATE CONFERENCES

A primary goal of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is the training of young leadership in Southern communities. All too often in the past, such potential leadership has drifted to the greater educational opportunities of the North, and has not returned to aid the people of their homes with their skills and knowledge. At the root of this problem is the failure of the Southern school systems to provide educational facilities for the training of Negro leadership.

SNCC plans to hold three-day conferences in each state each attended by approximately 100 students and staffed by speakers and resource personnel from college campuses, government agencies within the state and policy experts. The conference theme will revolve around "Leadership and its Responsibilities," with emphasis on the need for graduating students to remain and work in their own states.

Cost for each conference will be $2000; the five conferences will require $10,000.

LEADERSHIP INSTITUTES

The Leadership Institute will be an intensive seminar in specific methods of problem-solving. It will draw people from the state conferences who show exceptional interest and ability, as well as students in the work-study program, SNCC project directors and some staff members. The number attending will be limited because of the need for intensive discussion groups. Topics for discussion will include: anti-poverty campaigns, rural area development, manpower training, running apolitical candidates, etc.

Total cost of the Leadership INstitute will be $6,700.

FINANCES

| | |
|---|---|
| Administrative Staff | $37,112 |
| Work- Study Projects | 75,000 |
| Freedom Schools | 114,100 |
| Scholarships | 90,000 |
| State Conferences | 10,000 — OK - 5 regional |
| Leadership INstitutes | 6,700 |
| | $332,912 |

STUDENT NONVIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE
8 1/2 Raymond Street
Atlanta, Georgia

LEADERSHIP INSTITUTE

The problems of the southern states, and the protest areas in which the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee works only accentuate the problems of the nation. It is unrealistic to expect a better society unless students place primary emphasis upon the democratic processes of the nation.

The state conferences are primarily to emphasize the dysfunctioning elements involved in the system organized by the state, and how and why the state has planned the system in that manner. To further exemplify how the problems of the state accentuate the problems of the nation, a comprehensive analysis is needed to point to these problems and their relationship to the nation, as well as the role of policy making.

PROGRAM

The programming of a leadership institute will be developed by the educational staff of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, in conjunction with persons in policy studies and professors. The goal of the program is to allow for intensive discussion and workshops with experienced personnel. The discussions and workshops would deal with specific methods of solution to such problems as: anti-poverty campaigns, rural area development, manpower training, running a campaign for a political candidate, etc.

PARTICIPANTS

The Institute is primarily for students from the state conferences; students in the work-study program, SNCC project directors and other SNCC staff with leadership potential will also attend. The number should be limited, so that intensive discussion and workshops can be maintained.

SPEAKERS AND RESOURCE PERSONNEL

The speakers and resource personnel will be drawn from government specialists, economic and social policy organizations, research and from universities. The intention is to draw upon several different agencies so that different points of view are presented concerning policy decisions.

LOCATION

The ideal location for an institute that attempts to deal with these intentions is a cultural center where resource personnel can be readily called upon. The location should be within reasonable travel proximity of students. Suggested locations are: Washington, D.C., Nashville, Tenn., or Atlanta, Ga.

MATERIALS

The materials needed include research studies by policy institutes, government publications, and publications by persons who have dealt with the particular problems relating to the subjects dealt with by the institute.

BUDGET

| | |
|---|---|
| Room and Board for 300 students | $4,000 |
| Expenses for speakers and resource people | 500 |
| Transportation scholarships | 2,000 |
| Materials | 200 |
| TOTAL | $6,700 |

#

Student Aid Society Inc

Proposal for Scholarship Program

I. The Problem

Many young people who work on civil rights programs in the South have not been able to complete their formal education, either because of their full-time commitment to the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, or because of economic and cultural deprivation. There are approximately 95 full-time workers for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee who have either not begun or not finished their undergraduate training . A larger number of students who have been involved in various protest movements throughout the South are denied opportunities for higher education because they lack money, encouragement, and adequate preparation for many colleges. Still another group of young people are college students, particularly Southern Negroes, who wish to participate in SNCC's summer programs, like the Mississippi Summer Project, but are reluctant or unable to do so because summer employment is necessary to meet college costs for the coming year.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee realizes the importance of both practical training and formal education in the total learning experience of those who must direct and carry out the programs for a better society in the South. SNCC feels responsible in helping to provide and insure educational opportunities for those who have committed themselves or are willing to commit themselves actively to civil rights work in the South. A program is needed, therefore, that would provide encouragement and financial assistance to help such students take advantage of college opportunities.

II. The Summer Program

. Negro College Students

There is an immediate need of scholarship money for college students, who, by participating in the Mississippi Summer Project rather than getting summer employment, will be short of funds in the coming school year. In the past, many Negro college students in the South have not been able to participate actively in the civil rights movement for financial reasons. To allow this to continue is to deny the South's future leaders a very essential part of their training. These students are the very ones who will have to assume positions of leadership in the South's changing society and should have first hand, practical experience with those forces which underlie and shape a changing society.

The Mississippi Summer Project calls for at least 500 workers to man comprehensive programs of freedom schools, community centers, and voter registration. Funds should be available for at least 100 Southern college students who by participating in the Mississippi Summer Project will have a gap between college costs and financial resources. Applications are now being received and the response from Southern applicants is good. One staff member is currently informing Southern college students about the project and recruiting volunteers. Two staff members would receive and process the applications from those students expressing financial need. The need and qualifications for aid would be determined and awards would be made with the approval of a scholarship committee composed of trustees of the fund, if any, the executive secretary and chairmann of SNCC, and one of the SNCC advisors The awards, payable to the college would be about $300 each, equal to the amount that the average college student can earn toward college during the summer.

111. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee Staff

Scholarship funds are needed for 95 students presently working for SNCC who have not completed undergraduate training. These students did not complete their educations in many cases because they committed themselves to SNCC. The operation of SNCC's staff and program has been possible only because of their comitment. The present size and composition of SNCC's staff will permit some of these students to return to school full time. The nature of SNCC's programs and the greater demands on its workers to man these programs now require that all have at least undergraduate training. Community centers, freedom schools, and research programs call not alone for staff who are willing to receive on-the-spot training, but also staff who in an academic setting have increased their store of knowledge, refined their skills in reading and writing, and have exposed themselves to a rigorous and meaningful exchange of ideas. Formal college training will serve to sharpen the worker's tools for analyzing the field situation and putting together, again, the necessary elements that make for a creative program of action in a changing society.

Funds should be available for use in the '64-'65 school year for at least 30 of these staff members to return to school full time. These scholarships should attempt to meet the student's full need after the student has exhausted all means of financial support in the form of college scholarship and work, non-college scholarship, and family contribution. Funds would be administered by two staff members upon the approval of a scholarship committee composed of the trustees of the fund, the Executive Secretary and Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

1V. The Scholarship Program

The program will be directed towards southern Negro students, SNCC staff members, and the placement of Negro students in newly desegregated colleges that are seeking Negro students.

First, the program should recruit or identify those students in local protest movements in the South, who should be attending college. Secondly, a comprehensive counseling and referral program would provide information on opportunities for college admission and financial aid; refer students to the appropriate colleges and sources of aid; alert and interest colleges in possible candidates for admission and aid. Thirdly, a fund would provide scholarships for these students who, because of their poor academic training and cultural deprivation, are not able to compete for scholarship aid at many institutions.

V. Finances

| | |
|---|---|
| 100 scholarships for Mississippi Summer Project participants @ $300 | $30,000 |
| 30 staff scholarships @ $2000 | $60,000 |
| Travel to colleges and recruitment | $1,000 |
| | $91,000 |

STUDENT NONVIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE
6 Raymond Street, N.W.
Atlanta 14, Georgia

WORK STUDY PROJECT

THE REASONS FOR A "WORK STUDY" PROJECT

The Work Study project was devised to provide a meaningful solution to the conflict which now exists between the inclinations of young people to continue their education and to become involved in the civil rights movement, with its pressing needs for manpower. The program seeks to resolve this conflict by integrating the two activities of field work in civil rights, and academic training in the form of study led by graduate students and other well qualified people. Many who would otherwise have taken a year out of school to work in the movement have not been willing to do so because of their fear of losing scholarships or not being able to earn money for the following year's tuition. For this reason the program also offers scholarships to its participants in order that they might be assured the following year's tuition.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE PRESENT PROGRAM:

There are several very positive aspects of the project as it has operated so far. Close observers can testify to the growth of the participants in the program. They are much more resourceful and responsible as workers than they were at the beginning of the program. They show initiative and can be relied on to begin and carry through projects. One of the most impressive aspects of growth has been in their ever-increasing ability to express themselves concerning the current political, social and economic issues. The project has been unquestionably successful in its ability to supply the civil rights movement with additional staff to carry out its activities. The participants themselves speak of having a new incentive for continuing their higher education. Taken together these achievements of the program add up to the beginning of a new value and concept in our society; that of the creation of a more meaningful form of education which does not separate the practical and the theoretical, but rather realizes that for study to have meaning and pertinance it must grow out of and remain close to the real life, field situation.

PLANS FOR AN EXPANDED PROGRAM:

This coming academic year SNCC would like to expand the program in order to reach many more students and involve more Negro colleges across the nation.

A. Work program: The participants would be divided into teams in order to man various SNCC projects across the South.

B. Study Institutes: They would come together for four study institutes to be planned by the SNCC educational staff.

CURRICULUM FOR THE STUDY INSTITUTES:

An example of a particularly stimulating group of discussions in this year's program were those centered around the issue of Free Speech. Mr. J.R. Actermann, of the Tougaloo History Department, and Mendy Samstein, who has an M.A. in history from Cornell University, led discussions of the history of Free Speech in Europe. Oscar Chase, graduate of Yale Law school, gave a quick summary of some of the more famous Free Speech cases in American History, while Dona Richards Moses, who has a B.A. in philosophy from the University of Chicago led discussions of the opinions of Justices Brandeis and Holmes in some of the more relevant cases. (The last three discussion leaders mentioned are SNCC field secretaries.) In this discussion John Stuart Mill's philosophy was introduced as having been influential on the American view of Free Speech and the First Amendment in the Bill of Rights. This series of classes culminated in a very successful discussion in which the group participated enthusiastically. They expressed opinions on such issues as why Freedom of Speech is desirable or crucial in a democracy. They were encouraged to explore the questions in terms of the relationship of liberty to order. Spontaneous discussions have led to the groups' awareness of some very broad and philosophical questions relevant to their lives.

We hope the staff of the Institutes will develop new approaches to understanding the complex problems which face these students. (e.g. See the attached outline for classes at the Summer Freedom Schools for Mississippi.)

PLANS FOR WORK PROGRAMS:

The students will be divided into teams. Each team will work under the direction of an experienced SNCC field secretary. This year's participants helped organize for the Hattiesburg Freedom Day and remained there afterwards to continue to rally around the picket line. (The picket line still continues.) Some of the members of the group are working to organize the Mississippi Student Union as a result of their work in Hattiesburg. Others are doing research and writing speeches and organizing for the Freedom campaigns of the candidates for the U.S. Congress and the Senate. In other words, their activities will by no means be concentrated solely around demonstrations. They will learn to be organizers for the increasingly complicated work of the civil rights movement.

SOME GOALS OF THE WORK STUDY PROJECT:

In general what we are interested in doing is creating among the participants an awareness of themselves in relation to the very large complex problems of the society in which they live. Economics, Politics, Sociology and History among other things will show themslves in the form of real problems instead of as "disciplines" unrelated to life in general and more specifically, to the lives of the student workers involved. We can anticipate on the basis of this year's program that our most substantial achievement will be to whet the appetite of these young people for further study, along with providing a new incentive and added meaning to the learning experience. It is for this reason and the fact that the Work Study project affords colleges involved an opportunity to become involved in the community, that Tougaloo College and SNCC initiated such a program, and that other Colleges have now expressed interest.

STATE CONFERENCES

1. Background

The South is an area of economic, social, and cultural destitution as a region. To render any one of these areas as an area of improvement will create changes in another. The destitution in the local areas drains the resources of the state, and of the nation. Local areas form the root of the problem in the South, and wherever there is one of these problems there is evidence of another.

Because of the divergence from the mainstream in the South, it also lacks in leadership that can effectively relate to the ideals and goals formulated by the larger society. It is not the point that the South is without leadership, but the point is that the leadership in the South usually does not relate to ideals of the larger society, nor do these leaders relate to sources of change.

11. Sources of effective leadership

To effectively reach the sources of leadership potential in the South, the politically guided educational system must be combated. The private institutions in the South are at present the most fertile grounds for breeding southern leaders. These colleges have led the struggle in the educationcal sphere against the mandates of southern laws. Basically, there are attempts to create atmospheres of academic freedom, and cultural attributes. They are usually the only true cultural outlets in the state. Their opposition to the southern methods of education have been proven by their stands on education, and by their invitations to liberal minds.

111. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and Southern Colleges

Although many southern institutions both Negro and white such as: Morehouse, Duke, Tougaloo, Tulane, Emory, Talladega, and Vanderbilt have openly opposed southern education, there has been no drastic revolutionary change in education. Primarily this has been because the state still reaches the minds of most students in elementary and high school, and they have enforceable control even over private institutions.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee realizes the value of bringing white and Negro southern students together to discuss problems of education, and problems of the South: first, because they will be the leaders of the South and future opposition between the two must be curtailed. And secondly, because there is a need in the South for each state to have realistic evaluations of problems, and attempt to deal with these problems.

IV. State Conferences

The solution to bringing campus leadership together is first on the level of state conferences that deal specifically with local issues. This is the most realistic solution because it deals with issues closest to the students; it allows generalizations to be kept at a minimum. Negro and white students and professors have expressed interest in this idea.

The plan is:

A.

In each state approximately 100 students will be brought together for three day periods on a college campus or an available conference site. Major speakers and resource personnel will be persons from college campuses, government agencies within the state, etc.

B.

The conference theme will revolve around " Leadership and its Responsibilities," with emphasis upon the need for graduating students to remain and work in their own states. Workshops will be conducted during the conference on issues that concern the students, and what they can do to aid progress in their state.

C.

Budget:

| | |
|---|---|
| Room and board for 100 students..... | $ 1500 |
| Expenses..... | 200 |
| (a) Speakers, (b) Resource personnel | |
| Transportation scholarships..... | 250 |
| Materials..... | 50 |
| Total | $ 2000 |

THE EDUCATIONAL STAFF

The purpose of an educational staff with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is to have competent and experienced persons to deal with the educational programs now in progress. or proposed educational programs.

The function of the educational staff will be to plan, coordinate and administer. The staff will be responsible for program content, the development of materials, research, and the training of teachers and workshop leaders.

The persons on the staff should include:
(1.) Two resident college professors (with a year's leave from their posts). The two professors will develop research materials and study materials for persons in the Work-Study Programs; develop scholarly studies on the educational and political system in the south; constantly develop the skills of the graduate assistants.

(2.) Four Graduate Assistants (with graduate degrees or graduate hours). These assistants would be responsible for programming the research materials developed by the resident professors; conduct classes for persons in the Work-Study program, and discussion groups; serve as workshop coordinators when needed on campusses or by civic groups.

(3.) Four Teacher-trainees (college graduates). These trainees would shift their time between work in the office and field situations. They would be responsible for tutoring sessions for high school students; teaching assignments in the field when needed; developing background materials for students who will be aided by the scholarship fund.

(4.) Secretarial help and office space (these should be skilled persons who type and can take shorthand). Secretarial help is required in order to continually keep materials filed, and to handle correspondence. Office space will be required for the staff because they can not be placed in the present facilities of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in Atlanta. There should be enough space for files, offices and materials.

FINANCE

(1.) The two college professors should have their salaries of the past academic year matched. An estimate of these two salaries would be $20,000.

(2.) The four graduate students should receive the same assistantship salaries as graduate schools grant. This would amount to $3,000 per year. For four graduate students the cost would be $12,000.

(3.) The four teacher trainees should receive travel expenses and living expenses. This would amount to $2,000 per year unless a special fund is granted for travel expenses.

(4.) Secretarial help varies, but the usual salaries are $200 per month. The cost of office space varies, but the costs in Atlanta are usually $75 to $150 per month.

(5.) Materials will have to be financed as the need arises. Certain material expenditures can be anticipated now (typewriters, etc.) but materials such as books and special studies will arise during the course of the year. An estimated cost of materials for a year would be $3,000.

Suffrage, South JLC Labor Reports Sept 61

REGISTER FOR PROGRESS

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., a leader of the Southern civil rights movement, has announced that a new program of "stand-ins" aimed at doubling the number of Negroes registered to vote will soon be started in the South. At the present time 1,300,000 Negroes are registered. However, 5,000,000 Negroes in the South are eligible to vote, but have been unable to exercise their right partly because of intimidation and rigged registration procedures.

The new campaign will utilize the dramatic, non-violent techniques that have succeeded in abolishing lunch counter discrimination through "sit-ins," and ending discrimination in bus transportation facilities through the "freedom rides."

Dr. King, speaking of the new drive, observed that "we are seeing the last days of 'massive resistance' to integration," and predicted that in ten years all major urban cities in the United States will be desegregated.

We enthusiastically support this campaign and its objectives which are basic to the democratic structure of our society. Organized labor has always felt that a fundamental democratic right of every American is the right to vote. It is hard to believe that in a country which prides itself on the universal franchise for all of its citizens, 5,000,000 Negroes in one section of the land are denied this right because of racial prejudice.

The achievement of the right to vote by several million Negroes in the South would be a most important step in the fight for civil rights. For the first time real possibilities will exist for removing reactionary and segregationist politicians who are opposed to economic progress, as well as equal opportunity for all.

It is interesting to note that at the same time, a number of labor federations in the South reported the opening of new drives to get members to register. This was in response to the increasing harassment of organized labor by the "right to work" forces in the southern states that are preventing labor from achieving its goals. It is becoming increasingly clear that the goals of the American worker and the American Negro are closely related: full employment for all, more and better schools and housing, improved minimum wage, unemployment insurance and social security laws. And this can only be achieved at the ballot box.

These two new developments -- the registration drives among Southern Negroes and trade unionists, reaffirm the point made by AFL-CIO President George Meany recently.

In a speech before the Fourth National Trade Union Conference on Civil Rights he said: "It should be clear that Negro workers need the trade union movement. Anyone who weakens or damages the trade union movement is building barriers against the future advancement of the Negro himself."

Meany further stated: "The labor movement also needs the Negro workers. Not just for moral considerations, either, as paramount as they may be. The trade unions need Negroes for practical reasons."

The new registration drives in the South are a most important step in bringing this about.

Randolph's charges, the United States Civil Rights Commission issued a somewhat more objective report that concluded: "Most international unions have failed to exhibit any profound concern over civil rights problems" and several craft unions, "including those in the building and construction trades, have clung to their historic attitudes" of denying Negroes work in their trades.

The Commission unanimously recommended that Congress amend the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (the Landrum-Griffin Law) to provide that no union deny membership to, segregate, or expel any person because of race, color, religion, or national origin. Here, it seems to us, is an effective instrument to combat discrimination in the unions. Here, too, is a timely opportunity for labor leadership to demonstrate good faith in support of its good intentions by pressing for such legislation when the AFL-CIO Convention is held in Miami Beach this month.

The Old Frontier

The bulging budget for armaments has led the Kennedy Administration to "reevaluate" its spending for nonmilitary purposes. The first agency to respond was the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. Secretary Abraham Ribicoff announced a slash of nearly $102,000,000 in appropriations for the Food and Drug Administration, the Office of Education, the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, the Public Health Service, and the Social Security Administration.

Hardest hit was the Public Health Service, which was cut $76,806,000, of which some $15,000,000 had been earmarked for cancer research by the National Institutes of Health. Dr. I. S. Ravdin of the University of Pennsylvania said that if the cut is sustained, clinicians may not be able to use twenty-three promising new drugs which have been tested in the laboratory stage at the National Institutes of Health.

This strikes us as the most self-defeating kind of economy—the kind we hardly expected to encounter on the New Frontier. It seems to us inconceivable that the richest nation on earth, now spending more than fifty billion dollars a year on armaments, must pick the pockets of its cancer research program of fifteen million dollars as a gesture to economy. We simply can't afford that kind of economy.

Mauldin in The St. Louis Post-Dispatch

Closed Shop

The Hat Trick

Robert Welch, founder and proprietor of the John Birch Society, recently estimated that one-half of one per cent of the Catholic clergy in the United States are Communist sympathizers—"Comsymps" as he puts it. This is a pretty small percentage for a man who thinks the Eisenhowers and the Dulleses sold out to the Kremlin, but still it troubled Catholic leaders. They asked for particulars.

Specifically, The Pilot, official publication of the Boston archdiocese, asked the pandjandrum of the rabid Right how he had come by his figure.

"It was a complete guess . . . simply pulled out of a hat," he explained.

We have never seen Welch with his hat on, or hat in hand, for that matter, but we can see that hat now in our mind's eye—a wide, roomy, Texas job, perhaps twenty gallons, from which he pours the names and numbers and percentages of Comsymps without benefit of a jigger. It reminds us, somehow, of the trick Joe McCarthy used to play on the sawdust circuit. He would jump onto the platform with a briefcase which he implied was bulging with damming documents, launch into his expose of Communist infiltration of the highest echelons of government, and turn his eyes for confirmation to the briefcase—which he never opened. We often wondered if it contained his laundry.

The Battle for the Ballot

The Negro's fight for freedom in the South is now concentrating on a front which may well develop into the key battle in his long and painful campaign for equality. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., announced recently that a drive has been launched to double the number of Negroes registered to vote in Southern states, a movement backed by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, of which Dr. King is president. Victories won by the sit-in movement and the Freedom Riders have encouraged the Southern Negro to win for himself freedom of the ballot, but this fight promises to meet more formidable resistance from segregationists than any of the inspiring movements so far aimed at changing "the mind of the South."

Dr. King reported that of five million eligible Negroes in the South, only a fourth could now vote, largely because of stubborn, and so far successful, resistance of white officials to Negro registration. Few Negroes, and in some instances none at all, are registered in one hundred counties in eight Southern states. In scores of other counties, especially where Negro population is heavy, Negro voting, like school segregation, is little more than token.

Yet prospects for progress are brighter than ever before—not only because the "new Negro" is more insistent on obtaining his rights, but because he now has two powerful allies eager to fight in his behalf: the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Civil Rights Commission.

The Civil Rights Commission began functioning four years ago under the terms of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. Its findings and recommendations during the first two years of its life, under the chairmanship of John A. Hannah, president of Michigan State University, resulted in the Civil Rights Act of 1960, which strengthened the hand of the Federal government in protecting Negro voting rights. The published report of the Commission, based on a mountain of evidence acquired in scores of hearings in the South, reveals the magnitude and the intensity of Southern resistance to Negro participation in the political life of the nation.

Keeping Them in Their Place

The Louisiana story, as developed at the Commission's New Orleans hearings, provides the most complete picture of the variety of devices used to prevent the Negro from voting, although the same techniques are used throughout the South in varying degree. The Louisiana state legislature and executive branch, county and city officials, white citizens' groups, landowners, merchants, bankers, and in some measure state courts, have all joined forces to deprive the Negro of his vote. Even some Federal district judges have moved only reluctantly to protect the Negro until ordered to act by a higher jurisdiction.

The hearings brought to light wholesale purgings of Negroes from voting lists; defective voting machines; locked doors to a voting booth at the end of a long line of prospective Negro voters; segregated voting machines with no assurance that their votes would be counted; displays of arms; threats of violence; insults; collusion among registrars, election boards, sheriffs, and other law officers; official refusal to recognize the validity of constitutional amendments ("the Fourteenth Amendment was never adopted")—these are only some of the techniques used to keep Negro citizens "where they belong."

The Commission concluded from the evidence that there was apparently no limit to which segregationists would not go in their efforts to keep the Negro off the polling lists. For example:

¶ In Louisiana, two months after the Supreme Court's school segregation decisions, the state legislature established a joint legislative committee empowered "to provide ways and means whereby our existing social order shall be preserved and our institutions and ways of life maintained." It went into action in all parts of the state, in conjunction with a newly formed "Association of Citizens' Councils of Louisiana." Its activities culminated in the so-called "segregation law package," a combination of constitutional amendments and new statutes that even attempted to define disqualifying "bad character" as opposed to "good character." "Bad character" now includes common law marriage, historically recognized in the state; having illegitimate children; illiteracy; misdemeanors except traffic and hunting law violations. The new statutes went further. Common law marriage became a felony. Such "misdemeanors" as refusing to leave a public place when ordered, or obstructing a public passage, became "criminal mischief."

¶ In Ouachita Parish, in northern Louisiana, more than 5,000 Negroes received mailed notices that their right to be on the rolls had been challenged. They were given ten days to answer or have their names stricken. The reasons were varied and frivolous: some could not write legibly (proved by failure, for example, to put a dot on an "i"); others did not have telephones; individuals, even though resident in the community for years, were challenged to prove their identity.

Herblock in The Washington Post

"We Don't Want No Troublemakers from the United States"

¶ In succeeding elections Negroes won an apparent but transitory victory. In 1954 voting machines were provided, but the machines segregated for use by Negroes kept breaking down, entailing long waits. In 1956, the report quotes a Negro voter, "The door that the Negroes entered into the polling place was closed and locked. I stood there for three hours and fifteen minutes, not a single Negro voting, but the whites were continuing to go in and vote."

¶ In Madison Parish, no Negro has turned out to vote in more than thirty-seven years, according to the testimony of the registrar. A Negro who goes to the courthouse to register is told he had better talk to the sheriff. One Negro who tried to register and was referred to the sheriff was the Reverend William J. Neal of Tallulah. Said the sheriff: It "wasn't advisable" for Negroes to register just now; the time had not come for Negroes to vote in that parish; the Negro progresses too fast; with the vote he would have too much power.

The sheriff's last statement reveals the motive behind the Negro's drive to gain his voting rights. It also describes the fear behind the segregationists' bitter resistance; to the extremists, the fundamental democratic right of choice is "too much power." The ballot is a powerful weapon in the Negro's fight for freedom and the Southern segregationist is determined the wall will not be breached.

Yet the wall is being breached. In the last decade or so, the number of Southern Negro voters has doubled, and in some urban areas their votes are decisive. In Atlanta, for example, Negro voters recently defeated a segregationist candidate for mayor—who commanded a slight majority of white votes—by a substantial margin.

The Negro's hopes have brightened now that the Civil Rights Commission has exposed the opposition's illegal, ruthless, and often ridiculous tactics. The Justice Department has already undertaken several positive actions to stop these practices, and has given evidence of taking further steps. But more than anything else, it is the new determination of the Southern Negro to secure his rights which holds the greatest hope for success in the most crucial movement yet to develop in the South.

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mat. — Suffrage, South

Department of Justice
Washington

DM
JA file

January 3, 1962

Mr. Leslie W. Dunbar
Executive Director
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N.W.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Leslie:

In further response to your request of December 27, I am enclosing some lists of cases.

The list of voting cases includes three intimidation suits in Haywood and Fayette Counties (Nos. 6, 7, and 8) and one each in East Carroll Parish (No. 9) and Walthall County, Mississippi, (No. 19). The Tennessee cases, of course, all arose out of the same situation.

Of these voting suits, the registration cases in Terrell County, Georgia, and Washington Parish, Louisiana, and the white primary case in Fayette County, Tennessee, (No. 4) were completed before I took office. All of the other cases have been started or continued since then.

The list of voting records demands does not include some places where we obtained inspection of the records without making a formal demand.

I hope that these lists give you the information you want. I will be glad to see Mrs. Shaughnessy when she wants.

Happy New Year.

Sincerely,

Burke Marshall
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Rights Division

| | State | County (Parish) | Date Filed | Title (U.S. v. --) |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | | 1958 | |
| 1. | Ga. | Terrell | 9-4 | Raines |
| | | | 1959 | |
| 2. | Ala. | Macon | 2-5 | Alabama |
| 3. | La. | Washington | 6-29 | McElveen (Thomas) |
| 4. | Tenn. | Fayette - I | 11-16 | Fayette County Democratic Executive Committee |
| | | | 1960 | |
| 5. | La. | Bienville | 6-7 | Association of Citizens Councils of Louisiana |
| 6. | Tenn. | Haywood - I | 9-13 | Beaty |
| 7. | Tenn. | Haywood - II | 12-1 | Barcroft |
| 8. | Tenn. | Fayette - II | 12-14 | Atkeison |
| | | | 1961 | |
| 9. | La. | East Carroll - I | 1-19 | Deal |
| 10. | Ala. | Bullock | 1-26 | Alabama |
| 11. | Ala. | Dallas | 4-13 | Majors |
| 12. | La. | East Carroll - II | 4-28 | Manning |
| 13. | Miss. | Clarke | 7-6 | Ramsey |
| 14. | Miss. | Forrest | 7-6 | Lynd |
| 15. | La. | Ouachita | 7-11 | Lucky |
| 16. | Ala. | Montgomery | 8-3 | Penton |
| 17. | Miss. | Jefferson Davis | 8-3 | Daniel |
| 18. | Miss. | Walthall - I | 8-3 | Mississippi |
| 19. | Miss. | Walthall - II | 9-20 | Wood |
| 20. | La. | Plaquemines | 10-16 | Fox |
| 21. | Miss. | Panola | 10-16 | Duke |
| 22. | La. | Madison | 10-26 | Ward |
| 23. | Miss. | Tallahatchie | 11-17 | Dogan |
| 24. | La. | New Orleans | 12-28 | Louisiana |

VOTING RECORDS DEMANDS

| County (or Parish) and State | Date Served |
|---|---|
| McCormick, S. C. | 5/12/60 |
| Webster, Ga. | 5/16/60 |
| *Wilcox, Ala. | 5/12/60 |
| *Sumter, Ala. | 6/6/6010/31/60 |
| Hampton, S. C. | 6/6/60 |
| *East Feliciana, La. | 5/23/60 |
| Clarendon, S. C. | 6/6/60 |
| *Ouachita, La. | 5/23/60 |
| Fayette, Ga. | 6/6/60 |
| Early, Ga. | 5/23/60 |
| *East Carroll, La. | 5/13/60 |
| *Montgomery, Ala. | 5/23/60 |
| *Forrest, Miss. | 8/11/60 |
| Union, Fla. | 8/11/60 |
| *Bolivar, Miss. | 8/11/60 |
| Leflore, Miss. | 8/11/60 |
| Gwinnett, Ga. | 8/11/60 |
| Claiborne, La. | 4/11/61 |
| Jackson, La. | 4/11/61 |

*Court actions were brought to enforce the demands to inspect voting records. Still pending in three counties (Wilcox, Ala., and Forrest and Bolivar, Miss.).

Voting Records Demands (Continued - Page 2)

| | |
|---|---|
| Autauga, Ala. | 5/9/61 |
| Lowndes, Ala. | 5/10/61 |
| Plaquemines, La. | 7/10/61 |
| Pickens, Ala. | 6/28/61 |
| Greene, Ala. | 6/28/61 |
| Elmore, Ala. | 8/2/61 |
| Russell, Ala. | 8/11/61 |
| Barbour, Ala. | 7/31/61 |
| Red River, La. | 7/21/61 |
| St. Helena, La. | 7/22/61 |
| Miller, Ga. | 9/22/61 |
| Seminole, Ga. | 9/27/61 |
| Macon, Ga. | 9/25/61 |
| Lee, Ga. | 9/28/61 |
| Baker, Ga. | 9/26/61 |
| Franklin, La. | 11/28/61 |
| Morehouse, La. | 11/28/61 |
| Perry, Ala. | 12/14/61 |
| Hale, Ala. | 12/13/61 |
| Clarke, Ala. | |

NON-VOTING CASES

U.S. v. Harrison County
(S. D. Miss.)

U.S. v. Chappell
(M. D. Ala.)

U.S. v. I.C.C.

6/61 U.S. v. City of New Orleans (airport)
(E. D. La.)

7/61 U.S. v. City of Montgomery (airport)
(M. D. Ala.)

9/61 U.S. v. Pitcher (declare unconst. the law requiring pay
(E. D. La.) bus terminals & airports enforcement)
East Baton Rouge parish

U.S. v. Fraiser
(N. D. Miss.)

U.S. v. City of McComb
(S. D. Miss.)

U.S. v. Lassiter
(W. D. La.)

AMICUS PARTICIPATION IN CIVIL RIGHTS CASES

School Desegregation

Bush v. Orleans Parish School Board, 188 F. Supp. 916 (E. D. La.) 1960, affirmed, 365 U.S. 569

Bush v. Orleans Parish School Board, 190 F. Supp. 861 (E. D. La.) 1960, affirmed, 365 U.S. 569 and sub nom. New Orleans v. Bush, 366 U.S. 212

Bush v. Orleans Parish, 194 F. Supp. 182 affirmed, 368 U.S. 11

Allen v. State Board of Education, No. 2106 (E. D. La.) 1961

Angel, et al. v. State Board of Education No. 1658 (E. D. La.) 1961

Davis v. East Baton Rouge Parish School Board, No. 1662 (E. D. La.) 1961

Hall v. St. Helena Parish School Board, No. 1068 (E. D. La.) 1961

Allen v. Prince Edward County, (E. D. Va.). Government motion to intervene denied June, 1961. brief ~~[illegible]~~ 4/22

Taylor v. Board of Education (New Rochelle, New York) 195 F. Supp. 231, (S. D. N.Y.). Certiorari denied 12/11/61, -US-

Voting Rights

Baker v. Carr, 366 U.S. 907 (1961)

Discrimination in Public Accommodations

Burton v. Wilmington (Del.) Parking Authority 365 U.S. 715 (1961)

Garner v. Louisiana, O.T. 1961, -US-

Discrimination in Public Accommodations (Continued)

Bailey v. Patterson, No. 3133 (S. D. Miss.) 1961

Lewis v. Southeastern Greyhound (No. 1724-N, M. D. Ala.,) 1961

Other

Green v. Continental Airlines, Nos. 19771, 19215 (S. Ct. Colo.,) 1961 (Suit attacking racial discrimination in employment practices of airlines)

3-22-62 Suffrage, South

More significantly, we had no United Nations possessed of both these powers of check and veto—plus, as matters now stand, the power not only to outvote us in a forum of the world but also to affirm the rightness of acts of naked aggression (e.g., India in Goa) whenever the new U.N. majority may so choose. For the postwar world has brought us a most melancholy innovation: An extraordinary occasional alliance, in some very critical matters, of neutralism and Soviet communism against the interests not only of the West but also of freedom and ordered justice itself.

As I have said, our present strategic problem involves the exquisite choice between new Africa and old Europe—with infinite care being required not to give new Africa too much and not to leave old Europe with too little. But at heart, tactics is no less complicated. For the necessity here is to avoid destroying the U.N.—that is, to prevent a suicide of the U.N. resulting from the contagious madness of the Communists—and at the same time not to permit the U.N., under its new neutralist and Soviet pressure-bloc management, to destroy both the ancient values and the present reality of the Western alliance.

KATANGA FEVER

It is within the context of this maze of somber truths that Kennedy must work his way forward to a new national policy. That policy must be blended so as neither to throw away Western safety on behalf of the nonalined and hostile states, nor to allow the Russians to seize the U.N. lock, stock, and barrel on the claim that a reactionary West has abandoned the enterprise. Within this context our national debate must be conducted with decency and responsibility—lest we find ourselves in a witches' Sabbath of oversimplifications, name calling, and suspicions.

At this moment, while the crisis of Katanga is at the forefront of my mind and of the minds of many others, the top figures of the Kennedy administration have wisely recognized this danger. They have moved to restrain their own lower placed extremists. I do not intend to rehash here the pros and cons of the U.N. action in Katanga, except for its bearing on the central point of this piece.

I was one of those who opposed that action—not because I thought Katanga's secession was a good thing, or Moise Tshombe a prince of good fellows, but because I believe that a sensible order of priorities cannot permit us forever to go against the interests of our old Western allies, in obedience to African wishes. (Moreover, in the specific action against Katanga, we found ourselves in unhappy company with Russia—although the Soviets have, of course, bitterly opposed all other phases of the U.N. operation in the Congo.)

Those of us who took this position were called rightwing extremists and other such rubbish, sometimes by night-club commentators in their vast wisdom. Lower level State Department functionaries took up this sort of nonsense. The responsible people there slapped them down, not because they relish critism of American support of the U.N. in the Congo but because they are aware that this debate must have the dignity of honest, adult dispute over issues of almost preternatural gravity.

We on our side—that is, we who are Western alliance firsters—must be equally sensible and generous if and when any responsible people may suggest that John Kennedy and Dean Rusk and such are going along in the Congo because they are soft on communism. (At this time, to be sure, I know of no responsible critic who has made any such absurd accusation.)

There is no reason why those who must bear the burden of this complicated policy search—Kennedy, Rusk and company—should be forced into some either-or position here. They will never be forced into it so long as national discussion does not descend to the gutter or rise to a scream. The adult critics on both sides have the deepest obligation to see that it doesn't.

THE MISSION WITHIN

These are the outlines of this vast policy problem: what are the administration's present human facilities for handling it? As I see it, the position is about as follows: All at the apex of the administrative pyramid—Kennedy himself, Rusk, Under Secretaries George Ball and George McGhee, and so on—are not as much Western alliance first as people like me would like. But they are also not nearly so close to Africa first as people like us might fear. They are pragmatic men, desperately trying to put one foot precisely after the other in walking a high wire between the urgent demands of the one side and the indispensable requirements of the other. The President, while he does not intend to become an ally of colonialism in any form, also has no slightest intention of liquidating the Western alliance.

When one looks below this top group of moderates, however, the story is very different. It is my belief, based upon studious observation, that the second level at the White House and State Department is on the whole so emotionally committed to "anticolonialism" that the President will need to show great force lest they carry his policies outside his own viable, middling position by sheer evangelical zeal and, finally, wreck the alliance.

These are men of decency and, it goes without saying, of unimpeachable patriotism and good intentions. They are, however, men seized with holy mission, almost as zealous as the abolitionists who so plagued the fair and reasonable and practical Lincoln. Despite their disclaimers, they have on the whole become so preoccupied with Africa and with "anticolonialism" as almost to forget what are to me two cardinal truths: (1) The Western alliance is still the free world's one real shield from the brutally aggressive Communist imperialism; and (2) that alliance cannot forever endure in strength if a majority of its members continually find their vital interests ignored or opposed and if they feel themselves the chosen whipping boys of the United Nations—an instrumentality which they themselves largely created and for which they have made substantial sacrifices.

It therefore follows that even if Africa first is "right" in the academic sense—I concede this only for the sake of argument—it is still not "right" enough if we are to carry it to the point of outlawing our oldest and strongest friends. It is palpable that divisions among the Western nations over Africa and in the U.N. will be tolerated only at frightful risk. Take a single example, the Common Market. All Europeans understand, if Americans do not, that the whole underpinning of the Kennedy administration's new, bold, and desperately needed world trade policy is imperiled by the anger and alienation felt by both the French and Belgians at our course to date in the U.N.

This becomes a matter of the highest practical importance, surely, when one recalls this simple but gut fact: The United States badly needs Britain's entry into the Common Market as an essential element of our own new program to make common cause with that market. But Britain cannot enter the Common Market without receiving exemption hatches of various kinds, mainly in order to protect her Commonwealth ties. These exemptions will simply not be forthcoming without a good deal of hospitable generosity by France and Belgium.

UNTIL READY

Allied diplomats of distinction and of long-proved loyalty to the West and to political liberalism have told me in confidence of extraordinary confrontations they have had with the Africa first mind in the lower echelons at State. These diplomats are neither hysterics nor extremists. But more than one of them, to my personal knowledge, have gone out from visits to the State Department with the terrified conviction that some of its functionaries are so obsessed with the very word "Africa" they have all but forgotten that there is a place called Europe and a thing called the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

True enough, most of these people were hired specifically to work on African problems. They include G. Mennen Williams, the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs; some members of his staff; and Mr. Bowles, who is now a special adviser to the President on our dealings with underdeveloped areas, including Africa. Consequently it is their job to see that proper attention is paid to African needs, and points of view, in the top councils of government. No one can quarrel with that—so long as they recognize that other interests have to be considered as well, notably those of our European friends.

These men are mostly able, and they are universally dedicated. But universally also, in my opinion, they lack the sophistication to see that the United Nations cannot any longer be allowed to dominate American policy, or Western policy, though this is surely no recommendation for its destruction. They lack, generally, a respect for power, even power rightfully used—that decent power which Pascal once said must rule the world until the right was ready. They are so caught up in the myths of the evils of colonialism—as well as with the undoubted evils themselves—that they are not inclined, in their indiscriminate anticolonialism, to safeguard much else that is good and right.

So stands Kennedy's—and this Nation's—great and unexampled problem: to find a sure path through the jungles not merely of Africa and of a compromised U.N., but also through the jungles of emotionalism; to help make ready the new world without destroying what is irreplaceable in the old; to make true, calm choice between what in the Western alliance is really expendable and what can never be regarded as expendable if we wish to live in strength and freedom.

Mr. DODD. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

---

THE ALEXANDER HAMILTON NATIONAL MONUMENT—AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION DEALING WITH POLL TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 29) providing for the establishing of the former dwelling house of Alexander Hamilton as a national monument.

I

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the procedure being pursued in connection with this poll tax proposal does violence, I think, to the traditional processes of the Senate.

A. It is rather strange, to say the least, to use a proposal to establish Alexander Hamilton's birthplace as a national memorial as a vehicle for amending the Constitution.

B. The point of order which will be raised by the senior Senator from Georgia is, I believe, well taken. Although the rules of the Senate with respect to amending legislation are very broad, they are not broad enough to permit submission of a constitutional amendment as a substitute for an ordinary piece of general legislation.

C. Year after year the traditions and rules of the Senate are stretched beyond recognition when so-called civil rights legislation is considered. Our rules operate very well for every conceivable type of legislation, but for some the reason proponents of so-called civil rights bills are never content to abide by the standard practices. They nearly always insist on special treatment, or seek special priority for their measures.

II

During the course of this debate, nothing has been said to justify this unusual parliamentary procedure.

A. Efforts to eliminate the poll tax either by statute or by constitutional amendment have been coming before the Congress from time to time ever since I have been a member of this body. Yet it has never been shown that the poll tax is used as a device to prevent anyone from voting.

B. The constitutional amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has been before a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee since February of last year. Five of the six members of this subcommittee are listed as cosponsors of the resolution; however, it still has not been voted out, for consideration, by the full committee.

C. If the committee members who are cosponsors are so concerned about elimination of this tax, I would assume that the measure would long ago have been reported for full committee action.

D. I understand that there are now 68 sponsors of the proposed constitutional amendment. In spite of the fact that the sponsors number far more than a majority of the Members of this body, I know of no move on their part to discharge the committee from further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 58 under the procedure of rule 26.

This, it would seem to me, if they have due regard for our rules, would be a proper approach to this problem.

III

Mr. President, I would like to review some history in connection with the question of qualifications of voters.

A. The question of whether the qualifications of electors of Representatives should be decided by the States or the Federal Government was thoroughly considered by the delegates to the Constitutional Convention. The distinguished junior Senator from Virginia, only yesterday, I believe, or the day before, reviewed at considerable length and in a most revealing and incisive manner the nature of the discussion of the debate on this matter in the Constitutional Convention. The major dispute was on the question of whether a provision would be included in the Constitution that would allow landowners only to vote or that establishment of voting qualifications would be left to the individual States. The advocates of limiting the privilege of franchise to landowners was defeated by a vote of seven States to one, and the plan of the Committee on Detail was adopted without a dissenting vote. After a slight change in language, it became that part of section 2, article I, of the Constitution which reads:

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

IV

The delegates to the Constitutional Convention were obviously quite familiar with qualifications required by the individual States, then Colonies, as a prerequisite to voting. They knew full well what they were doing when they agreed on the language in section 2, article I, leaving the establishment of qualifications of electors up to the individual States.

A. The qualifications for voters prescribed by the States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution are rather interesting in the light of the hue and cry made today about the oppressive effects of the poll tax.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

The senate shall be the first branch of the legislature, and the senators shall be chosen in the following manner, viz:

Every male inhabitant of each town and parish with town privileges in the several counties in this State, of 21 years of age and upwards, paying for himself a poll tax, shall have a right at the annual or other meetings of the inhabitants of said towns and parishes, to be duly warned and holden annually forever in the month of March; to vote in the town or parish wherein he dwells, for the senators in the county or district whereof he is a member.

And every person qualified as the constitution provides shall be considered an inhabitant for the purpose of electing and being elected into any office or place within this State, in that town, parish, and plantation where he dwelleth and hath his home.

The members of the house of representatives shall be chosen annually in the month of March, and shall be the second branch of the legislature.

All persons qualified to vote in the election of senators shall be entitled to vote within the town district, parish, or place where they dwell, in the choice of representatives.

MARYLAND

That the house of delegates shall be chosen in the following manner: All freemen, above 21 years of age, having a freehold of 50 acres of land, in the county in which they offer to vote, and residing therein—and all freemen having property in this State above the value of 30 pounds current money, and having resided in the county, in which they offer to vote, 1 whole year next preceding the election, shall have a right of suffrage, in the election of delegates for such county. * * *

NEW JERSEY

That all inhabitants of this Colony, of full age, who are worth 50 pounds proclamation money, clear estate in the same, and have resided within the county in which they claim a vote for 12 months immediately preceding the election, shall be entitled to vote for representatives in council and assembly; and also for all other public officers, that shall be elected by the people of the county at large.

SOUTH CAROLINA

The qualification of electors shall be that every free white man, and no other person, who acknowledges the being of a God, and believes in a future state of rewards and punishments, and who has attained to the age of 1 and 20 years, and hath been a resident and an inhabitant in this State for the space of 1 whole year before the day appointed for the election he offers to give his vote at, and hath a freehold at least of 50 acres of land, or a town lot, and hath been legally seized and possessed of the same at least 6 months previous to such election, or hath paid a tax the preceding year, or was taxable the present year, at least 6 months previous to the said election, in a sum equal to the tax on 50 acres of land, to the support of this government, shall be deemed a person qualified to vote for, and shall be capable of electing, a representative or representatives to serve as a member or members in the senate and house of representatives, for the parish or district where he actually is a resident, or in any other parish or district in this State where he hath the like freehold. Electors shall take an oath or affirmation of qualification, if required by the returning officer.

NEW YORK

That every male inhabitant of full age, who shall have personally resided within one of the counties of this State for 6 months immediately preceding the day of election, shall, at such election, be entitled to vote for representatives of the said county in assembly: if, during the time of aforesaid, he shall have been a freeholder, possessing a freehold of the value of 20 pounds, within the said county, or have rented a tenement therein of the yearly value of 40 shillings, and been rated and actually paid taxes to this State. * * *

MASSACHUSETTS

There shall be a meeting on the first Monday in April, annually, forever, of the inhabitants of each town in the several counties of this Commonwealth, to be called by the selectmen, and warned in due course of law, at least 7 days before the first Monday in April, for the purpose of electing persons to be senators and councilors; and at such meetings every male inhabitant of 21 years of age and upward, having a freehold estate within the Commonwealth of the annual income of 3 pounds, or any estate of the value of 60 pounds, shall have a right to give in his vote for the senators for the district of which he is an inhabitant.

PENNSYLVANIA

Every freeman of the full age of 21 years, having resided in this State for the space of 1 whole year next before the day of election for representatives, and paid public taxes during that time, shall enjoy the right of an elector; provided always, that sons of freeholders of the age of 21 years shall be entitled to vote although they have not paid taxes.

GEORGIA

All male white inhabitants of the age of 21 years, and possessed in his own right of 10 pounds value, and liable to pay tax in this State, or being of any mechanic trade, and shall have been resident 6 months in this State, shall have a right to vote at all elections for representatives, or any other officers herein agreed to be chosen by the people at large; and every person having a right to vote at any election shall vote by ballot personally.

NORTH CAROLINA

That all freemen of the age of 21 years, who have been inhabitants of any one county within the State 12 months immediately preceding the day of any election, and shall have paid public taxes, shall be entitled to vote for the members of the house of commons for the county in which he resides.

That all persons possessed of a freehold in any town in this State, having a right of representation, and also all freemen, who have been inhabitants of any such town 12 months next before, and at the day of election, and shall have paid public taxes, shall be entitled to vote for a member to represent such town in the house of commons. * * *

VIRGINIA

The right of suffrage in the election of members for both houses shall remain as exercised at present; and each house shall choose its own speaker, appoint its own officers, settle its own rules of proceeding, and direct writs of election, for the supplying intermediate vacancies. (The acts of the earlier assemblies under the colonial charter had prescribed not only taxpaying requirements but also property-owning requirements, and that same were in existence and were incorporated in the setup of the new State when that constitution was adopted.)

Colonial charters

Delaware established qualifications for voting in her constitution of 1792. That came just after the adoption of the constitution. Connecticut and Rhode Island did not adopt constitutions until 1818 and 1842, respectively.

CONNECTICUT

In 1769, in Connecticut, separate qualifications were established for voting for deputies or representatives to the general court (legislature), Governor, and Deputy Governor (laws 1769, pp. 45, 301), and for voting for town officers (laws 1769, p. 240). Only freemen were eligible to vote and "An act relating to freemen" set forth the requisites to become a freeman, as follows:

"That all such inhabitants in this Colony as have accomplished the age of 21 years, and have the possession of freehold estate to the value of 40 shillings per annum or 40 pounds personal estate in the general list of estates in that year wherein they desire to be admitted freemen. * * *"

DELAWARE

Persons be of the age of 21 years or upwards, and be a freeholder or freeholders in this government, and have 50 acres of land or more well settled, and 12 acres thereof cleared and improved, or be otherwise worth 40 pounds lawful money of this government clear estate, and have been resident therein for the space of 2 years before such election. * * *

RHODE ISLAND

In Rhode Island prior to admission in the Union a person in order to vote had to be admitted as a freeman and be enrolled as such. In order to be admitted as a freeman the following statutory requirement had to be met:

"That no person whosoever shall be permitted to vote or act as a freeman in any town meeting in this State, but such only who are inhabitants therein, and who at the time of such their voting and acting are really and truly possessed, in their own proper right, of a real estate within this State, to the full value of $134, or which shall rent for $7 per annum, being an estate in fee simple, fee tail, or an estate in reversion which qualifies no other person to be a freeman, or at least an estate for a person's own life, or the eldest son of such a freeholder: And that no estate of a less quality shall entitle any person to the freedom of this State."

B. The poll tax is certainly a minor prerequisite to voting when compared with these requirements of the original States.

V

It is, I think, interesting to note that the five States commonly listed as being the only ones which require the payment of a poll tax have something in common with the New England States. The Library of Congress has prepared an enlightening study of poll taxes as they are levied in New England States. I would like to review the application of these taxes in the various New England States for the information of my colleagues:

MAINE

Upon whom levied: Males whether citizens or aliens who are inhabitants of the State who are above the age of 21 years.

Exemptions:

(1) No person shall be considered an inhabitant of a place on account of residing there as a student in an educational institution.

(2) Indians, blind persons, and persons under guardianship.

(3) Persons in active service in the Armed Forces.

(4) Persons aged 70 and over; persons who are veterans of World Wars I and II and the Korean war; and persons who by reason of age, infirmity, or poverty are in the judgment of assessors unable to contribute toward the public charges.

(5) Veterans of the Civil War; veterans receiving a State pension; veterans of the Indian and Spanish Wars; veterans of the Philippine Insurrection; disabled veterans of World Wars I and II.

Rate, $3.

Payment a prerequisite: Payment is a prerequisite to: (1) granting of a motor vehicle operator's license and registration of a motor vehicle; (2) issuance of a resident hunting or fishing license.

That is quite interesting. It goes considerably further than the provision in my own State. I continue to read:

Collection: The tax is collected principally by local officers from each taxable person in the place where he is an inhabitant on April 1 in each year. With certain exceptions, proceeds of this tax are paid into the State treasury. Remedies for collection include the imposition of interest and the levy by distress and sale upon the real and personal property of the delinquent as well as arrest of the latter. Delinquent taxes also may be sued for in an action of debt against the party liable.

As a matter of fact, the $3 poll tax in Maine is enforced, I would say, much more vigorously, and without any reasonable possibility of escaping it, than is the tax in my State.

I continue:

Relation of payment of poll tax to voting: Boards of registration entrusted with the function of preparing lists of eligible voters are assisted in this task by the receipt annually from tax assessors of lists compiled by the latter by house-to-house canvass and containing the names, age, addresses, and occupations of males aged 21 and over and liable to pay a poll tax and of females eligible to vote. The boards in completing their voting registers rely upon such lists; but any eligible voter whose name did not appear on the lists thus transmitted may be registered by applying in person to such boards. However, the registration boards exchange information with the tax assessors, and supply to the latter the names of all registered voters which did not appear on the voting lists submitted by the assessors. The assessors are thus apprised of persons liable to pay the poll tax whose names hitherto have been omitted from the tax lists.

I would say, as a practical matter, that the $3 poll tax in Maine is very effectively imposed. For all practical purposes, it is a prerequisite to voting, even though in form it is not stated in the law itself. In substance and in fact certainly it would clearly prove to be, inasmuch as a person could not either register an automobile or have a driver's license, among other things, without paying it.

I read further:

MASSACHUSETTS

Upon whom levied: On every male inhabitant above the age of 20, whether a citizen or an alien (Gen. Laws Ann. (West, 1958) ch. 59, section 1).

Exemptions: (1) Male inhabitants who are 65 years of age or over, or who, during the preceding calendar year, were recipients of old age assistance or of aid furnished by municipalities from funds appropriated by them for the relief, support, maintenance, and employment of the poor shall be assessed for, but shall be exempt, at their request, from the payment of a poll tax. Such request, when filed in any year, shall continue in effect with respect to poll taxes assessed in subsequent years, unless such inhabitant in writing shall otherwise direct. (2) Persons who by reason of age, infirmity, and poverty are in the judgment of the assessors unable to contribute fully toward public charges. In the event that a person so relieved of poll taxes dies leaving a net estate in excess of all his debts, said estate shall be charged with the amount of taxes from which he is so relieved with interest at 6 percent from the date when such taxes except for such relief, would have been due. (3) Veterans of the Civil War, Spanish War, Philippine Insurrection, and Chinese Relief Expedition shall be assessed for, but shall be exempt at their request from payment of a poll tax. (4) Members of the Armed Forces are unconditionally exempt during their services (Gen. Laws Ann. (West, 1958) ch. 59, secs. 5 (17A, 17B, 18, 23), 5A).

Collection: Poll taxes are assessed by local assessors on each person liable thereto in the town of which he is an inhabitant on January 1 in each year. Minors liable to taxation are assessed to and in the place of residence of the parents or guardians. If a person liable to a poll tax, who is in a town on January 1, refuses to state his legal residence, he shall be deemed a legal inhabitant thereof. If he designates another town as his legal residence, the assessors of the latter town are notified and thereupon complete the assessment.

Bills for poll taxes are distributed not later than October 1 of the year in which they are assessed, and are dated January 1 of the year to which the tax relates. Poll taxes are due and payable at the expiration of 30 days from the date upon which the bill was distributed. Remedies available to the local collectors to enforce collection include the seizure and sale of real and personal property sufficient to pay the taxes including the fees chargeable upon delinquency; or, in the event that the debtor has no tangible assets, imprisonment in jail for not more than 7 days. On poll taxes unpaid when due, interest shall be paid at the rate of 4 percent per annum, computed from the date when such taxes become due. The receipts including interest are paid over to the city or town treasurer (Gen. Laws Ann. (West. 1958) ch. 59, secs. 9–10, 57; ch. 60, secs. 2–5, 29, 35 (Supp. 1959), ch. 60, sec. 15A).

Relation of payment of poll tax to voting: As an aid in determining the residents of cities and towns who are entitled to vote, town and city registrars, by a house-to-house canvass, compile annually in January and February lists containing the name, age, occupation, citizenship, and residence on January 1, in the preceding and current year of every person, 20 years of age and older, residing in their respective cities and towns. On or before April 15 in each year, they transmit to the assessors from the lists thus compiled the names of all male persons, 20 years of age and older; and thereafter they furnish promptly to the assessors notice of any subsequent addition to or correction of their lists insofar as such changes relate to male persons aged 20 or over.

The registrars compile their annual registers of qualified voters by transferring thereto from the aforementioned lists of residents the names of all persons whom they can identify as having been included in the voting lists employed in the election held during the previous year. Persons omitted from registration lists thus prepared must appear in person and petition the registrars to correct the omission, and, if necessary, prove to the satisfaction of the registrars that the applicants are qualified and entitled to be registered. A male applicant may offer, as proof of his residence, a tax bill or notice from the assessor showing that he was assessed as a resident of his city or town. Tax assessors are apprized of all changes made in correcting the registration lists (Ann. Laws (1953), ch. 51, secs. 5–6, 8–9, 11, 34–35, 37–39, 42–43 (Supp. 1955), ch. 51, secs. 1, 4, 7. Gen. Laws Ann. (West. 1958) ch. 51, secs. 1–6, 8–9, 11, 34–35, 37–39, 42–43 (Supp. 1959), ch. 51, sec. 7).

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Upon whom levied: On every inhabitant of the State, from 21 to 70 years of age, whether a citizen of the United States or an alien. A husband shall be liable for the payment of his wife's poll tax if, when it was assessed, they were living together as man and wife (Rev. Stat. Ann. (1955) ch. 72 secs. 1, 5).

Exemptions: Paupers, insane persons, the widow of any veteran who served in the armed forces in wars which the United States was engaged, the widow of any citizen who served in the armed forces of an ally, veterans of any war in which the United States has been engaged, and veterans of any ally, provided such veterans record with the selectmen or assessors of the town in which they live their pension certificates or their certificates of honorable discharge. The term "veteran" includes members of any woman's auxiliary service which was subject to and under military law (Rev. Stat. Ann. (1955) ch. 72, secs. 1–4 (Supp. 1957, ch. 72, sec. 1–a).

Rate, $2.

Collection: Poll taxes are assessed before June 1, unless the time is extended, by town selectmen or city assessors and are payable to the collector on demand and without previous notice. Interest at 6 percent is charged on all taxes not paid on or before December 1 after assessment. The proceeds of such taxes are retained by the respective towns, cities, or counties. Remedies for collection include the seizure and sale of personal property sufficient to pay said taxes, or, if no personal property can be found, the arrest and commitment of the delinquent taxpayer to the county jail or house of correction. When any person is so committed to the county jail or house of correction where there is a workshop connected, he shall be credited for his labor therein at the rate of $1.50 per day, to be applied on the amount of his tax and costs of commitment. He shall be required to pay the jailor of the institution board at the rate of $2.50 per week, the same to be earned in the employ of said institution. Suit may also be instituted against a delinquent taxpayer for the amount of any taxes owed; and wages may be attached for payment (Rev. Stat. Ann. (1955) ch. 54, sec. 6; ch. 73, sec. 1; ch. 74, sec. 1; ch. 76, secs 2–5, 13; ch. 80, secs. 1–2, 8–11, 13–15, 50; (Supp. 1957) ch. 76, sec. 12; ch. 80, sec. 12).

Payment a prerequisite: Every applicant for a permit to register a motor vehicle or for a hunting, fishing, or trapping license must first submit an affidavit that he has paid his poll tax for the preceding year or was relieved of payment by exemption or abatement; but the permit or license may be issued if the selectmen or assessors certify that the same should be granted notwithstanding failure to pay said tax.

The tax collector, after making demand of a delinquent by a registered letter and receiving no payment within 14 days thereafter, shall identify the delinquent taxpayer on a form provided by the commissioner of motor vehicles or the director of the fish and game department; and upon receipt thereof the commissioner or the director shall revoke the registration or the license of the delinquent taxpayer and refuse to restore the same until the delinquent tax has been paid (Rev. Stat. Ann. (1925) ch. 80, sec. 3, ch. 214, secs. 10, 12 (Supp. 1957), ch. 214, sec. 11, ch. 266, secs. 4–8).

VERMONT

Upon whom levied: Upon all inhabitants of the State, citizens and aliens, over 21 and under 70 years of age.

A husband living with or supporting his wife shall be held liable for the payment of a poll tax and an old-age assistance tax assessed against his wife. A wife who is supporting her husband shall be held liable for said taxes assessed against her husband (Stat. Ann. (1959) title 32, secs. 3601, 5011).

It strikes me that this is a very unusually harsh requirement.

I continue:

Rate, $1 plus an additional levy of $6 for old age assistance.

(2) Incorporated villages are empowered, by vote, to levy additional poll taxes of their own (Stat. An. (1959) title 24, sec. 1369).

Exemptions: (1) Veterans of the Civil War, Spanish War, Philippine Insurrection, Boxer Rebellion, World Wars I and II, the Korean war, or Federal emergency service and their wives and widows, and the wives and widows of members who died in such service, if the veteran is receiving disability compensation and if application for such exemption is made on or before May 1 of each year and a Veterans' Administration certificate is offered. Receipt of retirement pay defeats the exemption; (2) members of State militia or of fire companies, if the town wherein they reside so votes; (3) persons actually poor; (4) persons receiving old age assistance; (5) persons serving in the Armed Forces during their period of service (Stat. Ann. (1959) title 32, sec. 3801).

Collection: Poll taxes and old-age assistance taxes are collected locally in the same manner as other State and local property taxes. Receipts from the poll tax are retained by the town treasurers; but 90 percent of the proceeds of the old-age assistance tax is remitted to the State. Towns and their municipalities, by vote, may fix dates of payments, and may allow a discount, up to 4 percent, on payments made in advance. Similarly, by vote, a town may collect interest at the rate of one-half percent per month on poll taxes that are delinquent as of December 1. Remedies to enforce collection include the following: (1) Distraint and sale of personal property; (2) arrest and commitment to jail, until the costs and taxes are paid, of a delinquent taxpayer who has no personalty available for seizure and sale; (3) suit in court for delinquent taxes, with attachment of assets in the hands of the delinquent taxpayer's debtors or of salary exceeding $10 in the hands of his employer. If wages in excess of $10 are attached, only $2 per week shall be withheld therefrom to be applied toward payment of the delinquent taxes (Stat. Ann. 1959), title 32, secs. 4004, 4062, 4111, 4152–4153, 4646, 4731, 4734, 4771–4774, 4791–4793, 5011–5023, 5071–5076, 5091–5093, 5136–5141, 5161–5164, 5191–5194, 5221–5227).

Payment a prerequisite:

(1) The commissioner of motor vehicles, on written notice from the collector of taxes of any municipality, including school districts, shall suspend, for the unexpired term of the license, the operator's license of any person who fails to pay all taxes for previous years, excepting property taxes, for which he is liable.

(2) Payment of poll and old-age assistance taxes, unless a person is otherwise exempt, is a prerequisite to voting in town elections. Payment must be made prior to January 1 preceding the town meeting. A person who is qualified to vote in a town meeting shall be qualified to vote in all other municipal meetings.

The collector of town, town school district, or incorporated village taxes, annually on January 15, shall make a list of taxpayers whose poll taxes are unpaid and deliver same to the clerk to be used by the board of civil authority at an annual or special meeting to determine who are not legal voters in such meetings (Stat. Ann. (1959), title 17, sec. 207; title 23, sec. 601; title 24, sec. 701; title 32, sec. 5161).

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that under the statutes of Vermont a person must pay the poll tax before he can get a driver's license?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that no matter what the emergency may be for driving a car, a person cannot drive a car and cannot get a driver's license, and if he does drive a car without the license he is in violation of the law, if he has not paid the poll tax?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is absolutely true. He is also subject to being put in jail. It is a rather unusual provision in these days in any State, to put a man in jail for failing to pay either his debts or his taxes. Nevertheless he is subject to arrest and commitment to jail until the costs and taxes are paid.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Is it true that there is no such penalty provision with reference to the very small poll tax required to be paid by Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Virginia, and Texas?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In my State it is $1. It is noncumulative. I have never heard of any one being put in jail because he did not pay it, or of any other effort being made to force the person to pay it.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that there is no provision in any statute in any one of these five States for anyone to be put in jail for failure to pay the poll tax?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is quite correct. I have great respect, of course, for the wisdom of the New England States. It has always been my impression that their affairs, especially at the local, town meeting level, are well run. This poll tax requirement may account for or contribute to that happy result.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Is that not basically what the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Alabama are fighting for; namely, to let these people make their own determination at the local level and to let them determine their own affairs?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is exactly right. I think it is a shame to intervene or interfere in the affairs of Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. These provisions have been in their laws for many years. It would be a great injustice and very shortsighted by this method to attempt to intervene in their affairs.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that the more power that is vested in the people and in the towns and in the communities and local habitats the more conscious they are of their responsibilities and of their duties as citizens?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There is no doubt about it. I believe the provisions which I have read may very well account for the political consciousness and astuteness that these people in New England have shown. While we have had certain differences in certain economic and political matters, nevertheless, the basic character of their democracy, as exemplified by their town meetings, has always been admired by the people of this country. I was rather surprised by the nature of the provisions which still exist in these States.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that the town meeting symbolizes the very essence of democratic government of the people, by the people, and for the people?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is right. As we have noted before—and I know the Senator from Alabama has said it, because I have heard him say it—one of the great merits of our system as it was originally conceived is the diversity which it allowed in the States. None of us knows the answer to all these questions. Here, in a sense, we have 50 different laboratories. Each of these States varies considerably from the other States, even in New England, which has a common heritage, and where the States have been very closely allied from the very beginning by race and culture.

Yet they have their differences; and we learn, if we have any sense at all, from the experiences in these different political laboratories. However, in my opinion, to try to make the laws uniform would be the height of stupidity.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that the States have their differences as to climate, differences as to natural resources, differences as to agriculture, differences as to industry, and differences as to economies?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Absolutely.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Does not that raise different problems in the different States?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes; those differences, and even greater differences, arose as the country developed. There were also differences in the human resources of the various States. As the Senator knows, the original States were settled to a great extent by Anglo-Saxons. In the latter part of the last century there was a wave of immigration from non-Anglo-Saxon countries. Those immigrants were fine people, but they had different traditions and different political experiences. They were subject to entirely different conditions, it strikes me, suitable to their own backgrounds.

I think one of our mistakes domestically—and I have noticed that even in our foreign relations we tend to make the same mistake—is that we have the feeling that every other country ought to be made to conform to our model of democracy. That is a great mistake.

Many of our people have been extremely critical of other countries whose system of government varies slightly from our own. We have looked down our nose at various types of authoritarian governments and have called them dictatorships. Sometimes they were. Sometimes they merited criticism. But there was the implication of superiority; the idea that we had the answer to everybody's problems; that if everybody would do just as we do, everything would be fine. Of course, nothing could be further from the truth.

There are diversities among nations just as there are among the States of our Union.

Mr. President, the passage of the proposed constitutional amendment will have a broader effect than the mere abolishment of the poll tax required in the five States that have been mentioned.

A. According to a recent Library of Congress study it would, in addition, have the following effects:

VI

The proposed amendment would also nullify a permissive poll tax provision in Florida's constitution, even though the legislature of this State has repealed the levy.

A provision in South Carolina's constitution permitting a person to qualify either through ownership of property or meeting the educational requirement would be nullified.

The proposed amendment would possibly require new legislation in certain New England States. The constitution of New Hampshire, article 28, states that a person excused from paying taxes at his own request is disqualified from voting. The proposed resolution would appear to nullify this provision.

I emphasize that this is a provision in the constitution of New Hampshire.

I continue to read from the study made by the Library of Congress:

In Maine, voting registers are made up in reliance on lists prepared by tax assessors. However, any eligible voter whose name did not appear in the tax list, thus transmitted, may be registered by applying in person to such boards.

In Massachusetts, a similar method is used to draw up the voting register, and the persons omitted must then show proof of their qualifications to vote.

In Vermont, payment of poll taxes and old-age assistance taxes is a prerequisite to voting in town meetings (no mention of general elections).

It is questionable whether the laws of Maine, Massachusetts, and Vermont would be affected by the proposed resolution.

In Rhode Island, constitutional and statutory provisions reducing the length of residence required for persons owning real estate would also be eliminated.

Several of the States have constitutional provisions disqualifying for voting "Indians not taxed" or "persons under guardianship." Indians have been granted citizenship by an act of Congress, and, though that does not grant them the right to vote, through State court decisions Indians are generally no longer disqualified from voting. Nevertheless, those provisions relating to "Indians not taxed" and such provisions relating to "persons under guardianship" when construed to mean "Indians not taxed" would violate the proposed amendment.

B. I can speak from personal knowledge about the ramifications of abolishing the poll tax in my own State. It would not only deprive Arkansas of a substantial source of revenue for the public schools but it would abolish our registration system since the list of persons who have paid their poll tax serves as a registration list for the election officials.

VII

Throughout this debate there have been no direct charges that the poll tax is used to discriminate against potential Negro voters. The Senator from Florida in his testimony before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments last year in effect said that the poll tax is not a deterrent to voting in the poll tax States. He said:

It has been accorded far greater importance than it deserves. The fact of the matter is that the amount of poll tax now required to be paid in the several States is so small as to impose only a slight economic obstacle for any citizen who desires to qualify to cast a ballot. This requirement operates, of course, equally on citizens of all races and colors and is generally subject to important exemptions which limit its application, such as the exemption of veterans, women, and citizens beyond a certain age. Nevertheless, the question has remained a vexing one.

A. The poll tax requirements in the five States which require payment of this tax as a prerequisite to voting have been liberalized substantially in the last 20 years. I wish to review some of these changes for the information of the Senate.

However, before I do so, I should add that the difference between these five States—of which my own State of Arkansas is one—and the situation in New England, which I have just described, concerning the prerequisites for voting, is largely one of form and not of substance, because, as a practical matter, under the enforcement provisions, in States like Maine and Vermont there is just as much pressure, if not more pressure, upon a person to pay the poll tax in order to vote at all as there is in my State. This is largely a play with words. I do not think there is much difference in substance.

I think it would be wise to place in the RECORD some of the provisions which are in effect at present in the five Southern States concerned, so that they may be compared with the requirements in the New England States. As I said a moment ago, there is much in common among the various States.

I cite, first, for example, the law as it existed with reference to the poll tax in Alabama in 1940. This will indicate how these taxes have been liberalized. They are far more liberal than some of those in the New England area:

ALABAMA

(Unless otherwise designated, references are to code of Alabama, 1940, recompiled 1958)

As the law existed in 1940, a poll tax payment of $1.50 was required of every person over the age of 21 years and under the age of 45 years, who was not exempted by law from paying same (title 51, sec. 237; constitution, sec. 194).

Exemptions: The following persons were exempted from paying a poll tax:

1. All persons permanently and totally disabled from following any substantially gainful occupation with reasonable regularity, and whose taxable property does not exceed $500 (title 51, sec. 238).

2. Veterans who served honorably in the military or naval service of the United States between January 1, 1917, and November 11, 1918, from all poll taxes which have accrued or may hereafter accrue (title 51, sec. 238; amendment 14 to constitution).

3. Every officer and enlisted man of the National Guard or Naval Militia of Alabama during his active membership and forever, after he has actively served an aggregate of 21 years (title 51, sec. 238; title 35, sec. 11).

Elections: To entitle a person, otherwise qualified, to vote at any election, he shall have paid on or before the 1st day of February next preceding the date of the election at which he offers to vote, all poll taxes due from him for the year 1901 and for each subsequent year (constitution, section 178).

Since the poll tax is $1.50 per year, a person who has not voted before and wished to vote in 1940 could conceivably have to pay a tax as high as $36 for 39 years would have elapsed since 1901 and in that period a person could have become 21 years old and already passed his 45th birthday, a period of 24 years. Of course $36 would be the maximum that could possibly be required of anyone. The fact remains, however, that anyone offering to vote at an election would have to make up his back poll tax of $1.50 for each year since he attained the age of 21 even though he had not voted before.

In 1944 the exemption of veterans from the poll tax requirement (of taxes which have accrued or may thereafter accrue) was extended to cover all persons who served honorably in the military service of the United States at any time, past, present, or future, when the United States was, is, or shall be at war with a foreign state (amendment 49 to the constitution).

In 1945, exemption from the poll tax requirement was extended to every officer and enlisted man of the Alabama State Guard during his active membership, and forever, after he has actively served an aggregate of 21 years (title 35, sec. 214).

In 1951, the exemption of veterans from the poll tax requirement (of taxes which have accrued or may thereafter accrue) was extended to veterans who served honorably in the military services of the United States when the United States is engaged in hostilities whether as a result of declared war or not (amendment 90 to the constitution).

In 1935, an amendment to the constitution was approved requiring, as a prerequisite for voting, the payment of poll taxes for the 2 years preceding the election. Thus the maximum requirement at any election could only be $3 (amendment 96 to the constitution).

In other words, that was a very important reduction, let us say, in the severity of the tax, in that thereafter it could not be accumulated for more than 2 years. I Continue:

In 1954 a constitutional amendment exempted blind and deaf persons from the payment of poll taxes (amendment 109 to the constitution).

In 1960 as of today, $1.50 poll tax payment is required as a prerequisite for voting. The maximum such requirement, including arrears, is—a payment of $3. Exempted from payment of poll tax, including arrears, are all veterans who served honorably in the military service of the United States whenever the United States is engaged in hostilities whether as a result of declared war or not. Also exempted from payment of poll tax are blind and deaf persons, all persons permanently and totally disabled from following any substantially gainful occupation and whose taxable property does not exceed $500, and every officer and enlisted man in the service of the National Guard, the naval militia, or the Alabama State Guard during his active membership, and forever, after he has actively served an aggregate of 21 years.

As I have said—

So from this recitation, Mr. President, we see that progressively over the years between 1940 and 1960, there has been a great amelioration of what was never a very severe burden; and certainly it is now a very minor burden on anyone, and is much less than the actual poll taxes in several of the New England States to which I have referred.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HICKEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Did the Senator from Arkansas bring out the fact that in Alabama no person over 45 years of age has to pay a poll tax?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes, I did. That is why I said the maximum which ever could have been due was $36; but today the maximum is $3. So this change constitutes a very great liberalization—if one wishes to use that term in regard to it.

Insofar as the use of the word "liberalization" is concerned, I am not sure that this change has made any great improvement, in terms of voting. However, that is another matter. But from the point of view of those who object to poll taxes, this change certainly constitutes a great liberalization.

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, let us consider the situation in my own State of Arkansas:

ARKANSAS

(Unless otherwise designated, references are to Arkansas Statutes 1947, Ann., 1956 Replacement and to 1957 Supplement thereto)

As the law existed in 1940, a poll tax payment of $1 was required of every person as a prerequisite for voting, except of those who reached the age of 21 after the period of assessment (constitution, art. 3, sec. 1; as amended by amendment No. 8; Ark. Rev. Stats. sec. 3-103, since then repealed and superseded by sec. 3-104.2; sec. 3-123).

In 1941, a law was enacted prohibiting the collecting of penalties for delinquent poll tax assessments (secs. 3-110.3-111).

In 1943 a law was enacted permitting men and women discharged from the armed services after the period for poll tax assessment has expired, to pay the $1 tax without the additional penalty (1957 Supp. sec. 3-113).

In 1944 Arkansas adopted a constitutional amendment permitting members of the armed services, if otherwise qualified, to vote in any election without having paid a poll tax (amendment No. 36 to the constitution).

In 1960, as the law exists today, a poll tax payment of $1 is required as a prerequisite for voting, but members of the Armed Forces of the United States, while in service, are exempted from this requirement. A person who has become 21 years old after the assessment may vote that year without paying the poll tax.

As I have stated before, it is not cumulative. If one has not paid his tax for 5 years, but still wishes to vote, he can do so after paying $1; and there is no law which provides for imprisonment because of failure to pay the tax—although imprisonment is provided for by law in some of the other cases I have mentioned, if one fails to pay the tax. So this matter in Arkansas is left to the choice of the citizens.

I submit that under this system there has been a very satisfactory participation, in my opinion, on the part of the people in my State in political activities. I would not wish to be personal about the matter; but I shall say that I do not see any great distinction or difference between the quality of the product under this system and the quality of the product under the systems in some of the States which do not have a poll tax. As a matter of fact, from the point of view of constituting a prerequisite for voting, the pressure—or the "penalties," if we wish to use that term—upon the people of Arkansas to pay this tax does not seem to me to be quite as great as is the pressure or the penalty in Maine in connection with the payment of the Maine poll tax, because in Arkansas one can obtain a driver's license or a hunting license even if he has not paid the $1 poll tax.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield again to me?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that today there are in the United States very, very few able-bodied adults who do not wish to have an automobile driver's license? In fact, is it not also true that under present economic conditions in the United States, today most adults feel it necessary to have a driver's license?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes, indeed. Certainly, today in the United States there are very few adults who do not regard it as necessary to have an automobile driver's license. I would say that about the only persons who, today, in the United States do not have a driver's license are paupers. As I recall, the other day I read a statement to the effect that there are now approximately 60 million automobiles in the United States; and that means that almost every able-bodied adult in the United States is able to own an automobile.

Mr. HILL. Is it not also true that practically every family in the United States today has, at the very minimum, one automobile, and a very large percentage of the families in the United States today own two automobiles?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes, that is quite correct.

Mr. President, I continue with Mississippi:

MISSISSIPPI

In 1940, as a prerequisite for voting, a person was required to pay on or before February 1 of that election year poll taxes due for the 2 preceding years (constitution sec. 241; code sec. 3160). The poll tax is $2 per year (constitution sec. 243).

Exempted from this poll tax requirement are persons over 60 years old, persons who are deaf, dumb, or blind, or who are maimed by loss of hand or foot (constitution sec. 243; code sec. 3163).

In 1944 Mississippi repealed the poll tax requirement for persons in the armed services, and allowed them to vote by absentee ballot, without payment of such poll tax (sec. 3196–07).

In 1952, a law was enacted permitting any member of the Armed Forces or any honorably discharged member of the Armed Forces to vote at any election without payment of any poll taxes which they have not had the opportunity to pay (sec. 3163–02).

In 1960, today, the law is the same as it was in 1940 but includes the exemptions enacted in 1952.

TEXAS

As the law existed in 1940 and as it exists today, the payment of a poll tax paid before February 1 of the year, is a prerequisite for voting (const. art. 6, sec. 2; election code arts. 5.02, 5.09).

All officers and men of the active milita of the State are exempted from payment of this poll tax except the poll tax prescribed for support of public schools (annotated statutes, art. 5840).

The poll tax required is $1.75 of which $1 goes to the support of the schools (const. art. 6, sec. 2, interpretive commentary).

Article 6, section 2a of the constitution was adopted in 1945 which waived the poll tax of any citizen of Texas who within 18 months prior to election has served in the Armed Forces (including the maritime service and merchant marine). It applied "during the time the United States is engaged in fighting a war or within 1 year after the close of the calendar year in which said war is terminated."

On November 2, 1954, article 6, section 2a, above, was repealed.

Exemptions

As the law read in 1951, the following persons were exempted from payment of poll tax: Persons over 60 years old, Indians not taxed, persons insane, blind, deaf or dumb, those who have lost a hand or foot, those permanently disabled, and all disabled veterans of foreign wars, where such disability is 40 percent or more (election code 1952, art. 5.09).

Article 5.09 of the election code was amended, omitting deaf or dumb persons from the above exemption (election code, 1960 supp. art. 5.09).

VIRGINIA

As the law provided in 1940, and as it is in effect today, a person, as a prerequisite for voting shall pay, at least 6 months before election his State poll taxes assessed against him during the 3 years next preceding the year of the election at which he offers to vote (constitution, sec. 21; code of Virginia, 1958 supp., secs. 24–120).

Exempted from this requirement are persons who served in the Army or Navy of the United States or the Confederate States during the War Between the States, and the wife or widow of such person (constitution sec. 22), and those pensioned by the State for military services (constitution sec. 173).

The amount of the tax is $1.50 per annum (code of 1950, secs. 58–49).

In 1944 Virginia created the armed services poll tax fund to be drawn upon for paying a poll tax for an individual in the armed services who applies for such payment at least 6 months before election. The act expired on July 1, 1946 (Laws, 1944, ch. 287).

So I would say it is quite clear, from this recitation, that the poll taxes in our Southern States have been very greatly liberalized in the last 20 years.

B. The Civil Rights Commission has apparently been unable to find any evidence that the poll tax is used as a device to prevent Negroes, or any one else for that matter, from voting. If the Civil Rights Commission was unable to find any evidence of discrimination due to existence of the poll tax requirement, I am sure that none exist. The Commission, in its recent report on voting, stated:

The absence of complaints to the Commission, actions by the Department of Justice, private litigation, or other indications of discrimination have led the Commission to conclude that, with the possible exception of a deterrent effect of the poll tax—which does not appear generally to be discriminatory upon the basis of race or color—Negroes now appear to encounter no significant racially motivated impediments to voting in 4 of the 12 Southern States: Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and Virginia.

Senators will note that three of the five poll tax States are singled out in this statement. At no place in the report is there any charge that the poll tax is used in the other two poll tax States as a discriminatory prerequisite to voting.

VIII

The present era has been appropriately called the age of conformity by many commentators on national trends. New studies of this tendency to sameness come to our attention practically every day. In this age of rapid communications and travel, when the many facets of our economy and our political and social life are so closely interrelated, there is a grave danger that we will lose the diversity that has such a significant factor in the growth of our national character. We are extending this same tendency to conformity to the very foundation of our governmental system when we attempt to eliminate a right which the States have enjoyed since the founding of the Republic.

The abolition of the poll tax will be only another step. In a short time the Senate will be asked to consider a bill establishing a uniform test for literacy. If the Congress accepts the philosophy that the States should no longer have the right, written into the Constitution, to establish qualifications for voters, there is no reason why a constitutional amendment, or even a statute, cannot be passed establishing uniform requirements for residency, or any other qualification for voting. Once the door is opened and the precedent has been set, there is nothing to stop the movement.

The issues involved here were well stated by Robert G. Storey, former dean of Southern Methodist University Law School, who is vice chairman of the Civil Rights Commission. In the recent Commission report on voting he said:

Proposals to alter longstanding Federal-State relationships such as that incorporated in the Federal Constitution, declaring that the qualifications of electors shall be left to the several States, should not be made unless there is no alternative method to correct an existing evil. Such is not the case today.

The Federal Government has sufficient authority under the Constitution and the existing framework of laws to enable it effectively to deal with denials of the right to vote by reason of race, color, religion, and national origin.

IX

If the Congress wants to homogenize the States, this is a step in that direction.

During this critical period in the Nation's history, unity is needed more than ever. By unity I mean a strong concensus of national effort in solving some of the critical problems which face us both at home and abroad. I do not mean uniformity with the connotation of mediocrity and adjustment to the lowest common denominator. The pending issue is one which tends to divide us and divert our attention from the real problems that must be faced during this session of Congress. This is an issue of no practical consequence to the Nation, and it is a tragedy that the Senate is forced to waste valuable time on such a question. The future of democratic governments will in the long run be determined by the ability of their citizens to make wise decisions, not by the mere act of casting a ballot by every adult in the Nation. Hitler rolled up an almost unanimous vote of approval from the German people, and the Communist Party candidates do it today in Russia and the satellites.

And I suppose the same could be said of some of the more underdeveloped nations, so far as the mere numbers of voters is concerned. The mere existence of the right to vote in no way guarantees a democratic system.

The Nation's Founding Fathers were acutely aware of the importance of education in a democracy. It strikes me education is of far more importance to the quality of government than is unfettered universal suffrage.

George Washington wrote:

Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of human happiness. In one in which the measures of government receive their impressions so immediately from the sense of the community as in ours, it is proportionately essential.

Thomas Jefferson also had a unique understanding of the necessity for an educated and informed citizenry in a free society. Jefferson correctly said:

> If a nation expects to be ignorant and free in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be.

He was as proud of his role in founding the University of Virginia as of his authorship of the Declaration of Independence.

God has not ordained that our form of government will succeed; nor is there any evidence from history to support the thesis that democracy is a natural form of society. Our form of government is the product of great human effort. It was created by our forefathers with the realization that man is potentially good, but also potentially a beast. Wise actions by our people will always be needed to keep the beast from seizing control. Through education we strive to bring out the good in our young people and to cultivate in them a desire to preserve and protect the values of our society. A good education is basic to good citizenship.

The exercise of the right to vote by one who is incapable of weighing the issues and making a rational decision does not contribute to the ultimate survival of this Nation. I can think of nothing better calculated to hasten our downfall than the casting of a ballot by a person who does not have the intellectual capacity to vote wisely. James Madison once said:

> Popular government without popular education is a prolog to a farce or tragedy.

The problem of education for citizenship was well stated in a comment by a noted scholar which appeared in a magazine some months ago. He said, in effect, that if he exercised his right to vote as carefully and thoughtfully as a citizen in a democracy should, he would spend all his time studying the candidates and the issues. This is a fair commentary on the awesome responsibilities of a citizen in a democracy in this complex and ever-changing world.

The frustrations of the cold war and the general complexity of life today prompt our people to look for easy solutions to complex problems. It is difficult for the shallow thinker to resist the impulse to believe those who have a knack for making complex problems seem simple. The apparent widespread interest in organizations such as the John Birch Society is symptomatic of a natural desire to find an easy answer to the difficult problems facing our Nation and the world. To blame all our difficulties on the Communists is simple enough to do.

It is much harder to face reality and to accept the world we live in, and then do something constructive to make it more to our liking. We can blame the Communists for our troubles from now until doomsday, but this will not contribute to the solution of our problems. A genuinely educated citizenry will not be deluded by crackpots and demagogs from within, or by alien doctrines from without. In the long run, the quality of our educational system and the intellectual capacity of our citizens will determine how well our heritage is enriched and preserved.

A short time ago I came across a very interesting essay by Harry D. Gideonse, president of Brooklyn College and former president of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation. In this essay, Dr. Gideonse gave a very lucid explanation of the need for education in a free society. His comments on the meaning of freedom are particularly pertinent at this time when there is a growing tendency for the individual to look at a public issue with the attitude of "'what is in it for me."

I am taking the liberty of quoting extensively from this essay for the information and enlightenment of my colleagues. Dr. Gideonse wrote:

> The greatest single cause of our confusion in the discussion of a national philosophy of education for citizenship in a free society lies in the fact that we no longer understand our own tradition. Our liberals and progressives talk of freedom as if individual rights can be separated from the common disciplines which free men must accept if a free society is to be sufficiently strong to make its guarantee of rights meaningful. Our relaxed grip on the fundamental principles of free society is perhaps the greatest single cause of our weakness as we confront an ideological alternative in which every social and cultural activity is directly related to a dogmatic faith.
>
> Freedom, however, is rooted in the responsibility of men as men, and not merely as specialized splinters of men. In our specialized pursuit of the development of free society we may easily drift into so intense a splintering of the total personality in which free society is anchored and rooted, that the quality of individual responsibility may vanish as the fruits of our specialization increase.
>
> The American conception of freedom is not merely the selfish expression of whim. It is not merely self-expression. Freedom is self-control as contrasted with control by others. The cultivation of innerdirectedness is therefore the core of the educational problem of a free society. The sources of responsibility are not cultivated by drift, nor by the pervasive advertising in press, radio, and television that promotes an ever-increasing diversity of material wants, nor by a journalistic overemphasis on news which is defined as the unusual, the pathic or the exceptional, nor by a sport page's systematic confusion of the reading public's ability to distinguish among commercial sports, spectator values and an educational interest in students who play rather than in athletes who register. Neither are they clarified by a view of freedom that stresses the removal of inhibitions, because the very essence of civilized society is defined by the presence of an appropriate selection of inhibitions, and this is merely another way of saying that freedom is self-control.
>
> The sense of responsibility from which this self-control is to spring is rooted in a disciplined life of mind as well as of emotion, a balanced grasp of frequently conflicting values; it is rooted in a sensible, realistic picture (to which reason and intellect can contribute) of the nature of man. The nature of man is not just intellect. Some of the biggest swine in human history have been great intellects. Some of the weakest spots in Western free society are due to excessive preoccupation with intellect, with analysis, and it is healthy to recognize this in the face of the fact that the great achievements of Western society also are rooted in the cultivation of intellect and reason.
>
> The hazard is in lopsidedness. The hazard is in doing only one thing and letting the rest go by drift. For if the rest goes by drift, the man on horseback may come along to exploit this drift. Whether he is a demagog from the right or one from the left makes no difference—the consequences to the freedom are just as serious in the one case is in the other. Typically, he is an expert in exploiting undisciplined emotion. And when it comes to that kind of challenge in a period in which national survival is at stake, you can trust the expert in the exploitation of emotion, whose only rationality consists in his rational exploitation of the irrational in man, to win—unless there is a systematic strengthening of the subjective factor in free society by the use of education in all of its broad ramifications.
>
> Now, in the matter of free government we can look the whole world in the face. Whatever they may say abroad about immature, young America, our written Constitution is the oldest one by a wide margin now operating in the world, and it was not written on the basis of a philosophy of faith in man. It was written on the basis of a realistic conception of the nature of man, wholly aware of the fact that man is potentially good—that's why we trusted ourselves with free Government institutions—but also deeply aware of the fact that man who is potentially good is also potentially a beast. Therefore, we would not trust the Government we set up with unqualified power. Therefore, we established governmental institutions that separated power and dispersed control. The reason we separated power and dispersed control is that we did not trust man with unqualified power, power that was not dispersed. In other words, we had a realistic theory of the nature of man. We saw him not just as mind, but we saw him as potentially evil in character; we saw even the potentially angelic element in man as, under the trust of complete power, most vulnerable indeed to the temptations and the lusts for power that bring out the bestial.
>
> The Greeks had, as they often did, a word for it. The word "idiot" as we use it today describes, technically, a type of feeble-minded person and, popularly, a person who is very stupid and incapable of intellectual effort, one who has an idiotic way of doing things. The Greek word, of course, meant something very different, although it is the word from which we drew ours. The Greeks used the word "idiot" for a man who might have very keen analytical capacity, who might be a scholar, but who had no interest in the whole of things. The Greek idiot was an altogether private man. He had no public spirit, as we might express it. He had no awareness of his being part of a larger whole. In that sense, we can say that the American college and university, with all of its specialists who know only one thing and are very little interested in the total impact of all these separate things on the whole of the young personality for which they are responsible, contains—in the original Greek use of the term—a larger percentage of idiots than the population of the country as a whole.
>
> And the whole of public life is full of idiocy in the Greek sense of the term, because all of public life is rooted in the assumption that the determining fact of all public policy is its bearing on the pursuit of higher standards of material living. This is taken for granted on the right as well as on the left. Presidential candidates differ in the United States not in their acceptance of this objective, but in methods of achieving that objective. Some Democrats will say that we can achieve it with a little more public action, some Republicans with a little less public action, but they will all agree that the purpose should be the increase of material standards of living. But increasing material standards of living implies more specialization, more division of labor, more conveyor-belt, doing-just-one-thing-all-the-time action, because that's the way in which analytical man has demonstrated that he can increase material returns per individual involved in production.

If there is anything to the picture I have presented here, it will be observed that the implications of the public drive toward increased productivity, toward applied science and technology, toward specialized, conveyor-belt production, is a sharper drive toward increasingly specialized use of only a small part of man's whole personal endowment. The danger of increasing unawareness of the need for cultivating the whole of a balanced human personality is implicit in the temptation to increase vocational and specialized pressures directly related to economic as well as to defense needs.

Historically and morally we know that freedom is anchored in a realistic view of the nature of responsible man, and in his nature as a whole. And this has challenging educational implications especially in a time in which family, church and community have in varying ways lost a good deal of their effectiveness as educational agencies. Man has a body as well as a mind, man has glands as well as a brain, and free man has a need for disciplined emotions as well as for a disciplined mind. It may be a fatal gap in our total defense of free society to overlook the role of disciplined emotion, trained imagination, the significance of rhythm, tradition and ceremony, the cultivation of the subjective and the valuational in our exclusive pursuit of intellectually and economically productive byproducts of specialized competence.

There is great peril in a blind continuation of present educational tendencies to serve existing vocational needs in our rapidly shifting economic order. Automation and modern scientific developments have given a special urgency to Woodrow Wilson's warning more than 50 years ago that "the man of special skill can be changed into an unskilled laborer overnight." If public education is to be genuinely in the Nation's service it should be deeply concerned with the erosion of community values and all the other unplanned and unintended cultural byproducts of the proliferating variety of economic and technical interests which are part of the mainstream of our economic life. We should increasingly think of education as concerned with the total of the formative influences that are brought to bear on our youth by the American community. The content of formal education should be modified in accordance with observable shifts in the formative impact of other social activities such as those of the church, the family and the increasingly more significant influence of competitive advertising in the press, in the movies, in radio and in television.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CARLSON. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas if he is quoting the views on education of someone else; or are they his own views? Personally I think it is a very fine statement.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am reading from a statement by Dr. Harry D. Gideonse, president of Brooklyn College, and former president of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation. I shall comment on his observations in a few moments.

I continue to quote from Dr. Gideonse:

There is a sense in which freedom will ultimately be preserved or lost in this Nation's educational establishments. No amount of technological productivity and no increase of professional military proficiency can overcome the vital fact that the effectiveness of a nation's total performance in the world community will be finally determined by the disciplined will and purpose of its youth, and by their commitment to and their experience with the values of free men and women. These qualities are not byproducts of specialized or vocational scholarship, and they are not supplied by a program of supplementary verbal indoctrination as if they could be finally added to the program of instruction much in the manner in which a fudge sauce is poured over a dish of ice cream.

That ends the quotation from Dr. Gideonse's essay.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. CARLSON. I should like to inquire again who Dr. Gideonse is and what his background in the educational field is.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. He is president of Brooklyn College. He is a distinguished scholar. I met him some time ago. He has been a leading educator in this country for a number of years and has always taken a very enlightened interest in public affairs, which not all academic people do. But I think he was especially qualified to comment upon the subject.

One of the reasons why—and I shall refer to it later—I believe it is especially appropriate here is that we are spending hours, as we do every year, and days, and sometimes weeks, arguing about a matter such as the poll tax, which I think, as I have already stated, has no real, significant impact upon our democracy. Yet we have been unable to pass in Congress—although the Senate has passed it four times—a bill to aid education. Members of Congress who are interested in improving the quality of our democratic processes can help bring it about through better education, just as Dr. Gideonse has stated. I have already quoted George Washington and Thomas Jefferson to the same effect. They were all quite aware of it.

While it is not a time for pessimism, it is not difficult to see that there is need for improvement in the functioning of our democratic system. This need will not be met by eliminating the poll tax. My point is, as it is also Dr. Gideonse's, that if we are going to do anything about it, the obvious, clear, and fundamental way is to do something about the quality of education in this country.

Mr. CARLSON. Would not the Senator from Arkansas agree that so long as we are discussing the poll tax issue, we are at least not enacting legislation which might not be in the public interest of this country, and that this might give us a little breathing spell to think about it?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I must agree with the Senator from Kansas that in view of the rather unjustified and unwarranted measures, in my view, that have been passed time and time again, there is something in what the Senator says, although I am not sure that we would be passing something that would do more harm to the country than the measure under discussion. The particular measure we are discussing affects the educational system in my State. The money derived from the poll tax in Arkansas is devoted to the public schools. I represent a materially poor State. It is a much poorer State than the State represented by the Senator from Kansas. Approximately $600,000, the amount taken in by the poll tax in the traditional way, is devoted to school purposes. There has been no complaint about it. The people in my State submitted this question to a referendum some 6 years ago. It was done to find out what they thought about it. The question was whether they wished to repeal it. They voted by a very large majority to retain it. Ordinarily when the people have an opportunity to repeal a tax, 9 times out of 10 they will vote to repeal it, no matter what the tax is.

I believe the Senator will agree with me that taxing is not one of the most popular functions of government. In this case the people of my State voted to keep the tax as it was. It is a tax from which a substantial amount of money is derived for the schools. I do not like to include the Senate in this statement, because in my opinion the Senate has performed very well on aid to education. It has passed an aid to education bill four times. It passed a good education bill last year. So I do not believe that we in the Senate should bear any blame. We passed such a measure four times. The other body has failed each time. It has always been able to tie it up or kill it. In the light of that action it seems the height of absurdity and indefensible to deprive a State that needs the money, as does mine, of this source of revenue. If we are not going to get the kind of assistance we ought to have from the Federal Government, we ought not to deprive the State of the right to collect taxes from its own people.

If the Members of this body sincerely want to improve our society and make our Government more effective in the long pull, we should be discussing the status of our educational system and what can be done about it rather than this emotional issue which will have no bearing on the success or failure of our democracy. I received a letter a day or so ago from Mr. C. C. Stuart, Arkansas City, Ark., who is president of the county school supervisors association in my State. I quote this letter for the information of the Senate:

DESHA COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION,
Arkansas City, Ark., March 17, 1962.

Re poll tax bill.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The county school administrators of Arkansas requested me, as their president, to express to you our hope that the school funds lost by this legislation, should it pass, will be replaced by some form of amendment.

It has been our experience that election rights are not affected by our poll tax requirements.

We take this opportunity to express to you our deepest appreciation for the support you have given to securing a wider financial support for our schools in Arkansas.

Yours truly,

C. C. STUART,
President, Arkansas County School Supervisors Association.

I believe that the very least that the sponsors of the amendment should do is to join to it a provision providing for the States the money that they will lose by the passage of the amendment. In our case it approximates $600,000.

I hope the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], if he intends to press the amendment, and the other 67 sponsors, will support an amendment making up to the State of Arkansas the money that it will be deprived of by adoption of this proposal.

I believe that Mr. Stuart makes a very good point. He suggests that some form of amendment should be added. I have been thinking about what kind of amendment can be offered under the present parliamentary situation. It is a rather difficult problem, when we have before us a bill creating a memorial for Alexander Hamilton, and the proposed constitutional amendment will be offered as a substitute. Under the circumstances I am not quite certain how I could go about adding a provision which would replace the $600,000 which will be taken away from the schools of my State. I would solicit some advice from my colleagues as to how we might make up this loss.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. CARLSON. I am wondering whether the Senator from Arkansas could inform us if we are again to consider the Stella School bill, which I know is still on the calendar.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not know. I get the Senator's point. We find ourselves in a similar parliamentary situation.

I note that the Senator from Florida has returned to the Chamber. I have read a letter from the president of the Arkansas County School Supervisors Association, which reads as follows:

DESHA COUNTY
DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION,
Arkansas City, Ark., March 17, 1962.

Re poll tax bill.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The county school administrators of Arkansas requested me, as their president, to express to you our hope that the school funds lost by this legislation, should it pass, will be replaced by some form of amendment.

It has been our experience that election rights are not effected by our poll tax requirements.

We take this opportunity to express to you our deepest appreciation for the support you have given to securing a wider financial support for our schools in Arkansas.

Yours truly,

C. C. STUART,
President, Arkansas County School Supervisors Association.

I have just said that the complex parliamentary situation is bothering me a little. I believe that in all fairness the Senator from Florida, being the principal sponsor of the resolution, ought to find a way to help me discover how to replace the $600,000 of which his amendment, if it is adopted, will deprive our school system. We are not a rich State, like the great State of Florida, which siphons most of its accumulated wealth from all of the other States.

We are very hard up for money for schools. I hope the Senator will give consideration to finding a way by amendment to replace the $600,000 which will be taken from the Arkansas schools if his proposal is enacted.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator know that the enactment of this amendment and its ratification by the States would not interfere in the slightest with the present law of Arkansas or with the present collection of the poll tax in Arkansas? Does he not know that the only result of the adoption of the amendment would be to lift the requirement of poll tax payments as a prerequisite for voting for electors for President and Vice President and for Senators and Members of the House of Representatives? Does he not know that his great State of Arkansas could still have its poll tax; that its people could still pay it; that its teachers could still get it; and that the requirement of the poll tax payment, so far as this measure is concerned, could still exist with reference to voting for Governor and all other State, county, and local offices? Does not the Senator from Arkansas know that?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I know that; but before the Senator came into the Chamber, I said the people of Arkansas had voted on this question. It was submitted in the form of an initiated amendment only 6 years ago. It was one of the few instances I can recall in which the people are asked if they wish to continue a tax upon themselves or to do away with it. The people voted by a large majority to continue the tax.

I agree that it would always be possible to adopt some other tax or try to get the revenue in some other way. But to abolish the poll tax would cause difficulties. Its abolition through the passage of this measure would upset a traditional way to raise revenue for schools.

Arkansas does not have, as many States I have mentioned do have, a provision by which a person can be put in jail if he does not pay the poll tax. As I understand the law in Vermont and New Hampshire, if a person does not pay the poll tax there, he can be put in jail. That is a very effective way of increasing tax collections.

If a person in Arkansas does not pay the poll tax, no one will come around to attach his property, arrest him, or put him in jail. In Arkansas a person who does not pay is left alone. The payment of the poll tax is voluntary. One does not have to pay it unless he wishes to vote. I was surprised to learn in my research that one could be put in jail in some New England States for not paying the poll tax.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for another question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator know that the proposed amendment which the Senator from Florida hopes he will have an opportunity to offer does not affect in the slightest the right of the State of Arkansas, under its present poll tax law, to continue to collect the poll tax and to continue to require the payment of a poll tax as a condition for voting for State, county, and local offices? Does not the Senator think it is almost unkind of him to allow the official in Arkansas who has written him to believe that this amendment really affects him in that way at all?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If I understand what the Senator from Florida is saying, it is that if the proposed amendment were enacted, it would have no effect whatever upon the operation of the Arkansas poll tax since payment of a poll tax could still be made a prerequisite to voting for State and local officials. However, voting for Federal officials is one of the greatest incentives to voting, as the Senator from Florida well knows. The Senator can look at the record of the payment of the Arkansas poll tax in national elections and learn that the income from that tax is always substantially higher—and I am sure it is higher in other States—in the presidental election years.

The poll tax provides a substantial sum for the school fund. I think the proposal to abolish the poll tax is an attempt to intervene in the affairs of Arkansas and deprive us of that amount of revenue.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator recall that while he was speaking the other day in response to questions asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], it was made abundantly clear that it was not elections for Presidential and other national offices that brought out the heavy votes, but elections for courthouse candidates, local candidates, and State candidates that resulted in heavy turnouts? Does he not recall that it was in those years that the poll tax receipts were the heaviest? Does not the Senator remember that?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not think that is entirely true. Very often in special county races that is true. But the situation varies from year to year. Some elections are held with very little interest; but at another time the issues and the candidates stimulate a large turnout. In Arkansas, there is always a heavy vote in the general election in a presidential election year.

My State is a little different from the Senator's State, as all States are different. Thank God they are not all the same. Arkansas does not have as many Republicans as does the Senator's State of Florida; but we still have a good number of them. They get busy and vote in large numbers in a national election. They do not vote in such large numbers in what we call strictly local elections. But every 4 years, when the presidential election is held, the Republicans turn out in threateningly larger numbers. Recently they came pretty close to winning—too close for comfort. In any case, they vote in very large numbers in presidential election years.

The Civil Rights Commission has not found any evidence that the poll tax is used as a discriminatory device. Certainly that is true in my State.

I predict that the poll tax States will be called upon to institute a new source of revenue if the proposed amendment is enacted. Something different will have to be done. I do not know what the solution will be, but it will necessary to raise more money. It will be necessary to have another tax, or else to do without the revenue which is now being received.

As I see it, the poll tax does no harm to our democracy or to voting in the States. At the same time, it provides a substantial sum of money for our educational system.

I do not wish to repeat it, because I do not for a moment want to reiterate my argument. However, I have already described the same situation in Texas. The $1.75 poll tax in Texas goes to the schools.

Mr. President, Mr. Stuart, in his letter, has pointed out one of the major considerations which has influenced my attitude toward this proposed amendment. I certainly agree with him that Congress should, if it approves this proposal, enact some measure which would replace the school revenues which will be lost in Arkansas and other poll tax States by the adoption of this amendment. Of course, I hope that Congress will go much further and will approve a realistic general Federal aid to education proposal at this session. In spite of the substantial majority which approved the Federal aid to education bill in the Senate last year, as evidenced by the 49 to 34 vote, the House of Representatives appears to be hopelessly bogged down, and the outlook for final passage of a bill this session is rather dim.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did the Senator give any thought to the financial question when he so kindly joined with the Senator from Florida in introducing this amendment in the 82d Congress, the 83d Congress, and the 84th Congress, over a period of 6 years, during which he evidently thought the amendment would be good for his State and for the whole Nation?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I certainly gave thought to this aspect of the question. In practically every measure that comes before the Senate there are some plusses and some minuses. Nevertheless, if it were to be done, I thought then that this was a better method than to accomplish it by mere approval of a statute. It would do much less violence to the Constitution.

Mr. President, I believe that before the Senator from Florida entered the Chamber, I had made the point that even though we are faced with an overwhelming majority—as apparently we are, at least judging from the number of sponsors of this proposal—in favor of the proposal now under discussion—at least the Senator from Florida is proposing to follow the constitutional method by which this matter could be changed in contrast to proposing that the change be made by means of an ordinary statute. As he knows, several former sponsors of the Senator's proposal were faced with the alternative of either sponsoring and supporting a proposed constitutional amendment or having a statute passed to abolish the tax. Such a statute would clearly be unconstitutional.

Of course, having so little respect for recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, we did not wish to take the chance of hoping that the Supreme Court would declare such a statute unconstitutional, although it clearly would be.

However, today all we are faced with is a proposed constitutional amendment. Of course, if the Senator from Florida has the good sense to withdraw or drop his proposal—and I think he should do so—and if the Senate were then to proceed to the consideration of a bill dealing with this subject, I would oppose the bill, too.

At any rate, I am trying to point out that the real danger to our democracy is not the poll tax which is imposed in only five States. Instead, the real danger lies in our general neglect, as a nation, of education over the past 50 years.

I am sure the Senator from Florida has no idea how difficult it is to find new tax funds in a State as poor as my State is. The other day I read that lots at Cape Canaveral or at Cocoa Beach, or at some other place in that area, which 15 years ago sold for $10 each, are now selling for $50,000, or some such figure. I am sure the Senator from Florida knows all about those matters. In Florida, the money is pouring in so rapidly and in such great quantities that the people there have difficulty finding places or ways to spend it. However, that is not at all the case in Arkansas; and it would be a blow to our schools to be deprived of this revenue.

So I hope the Senator from Florida will give sympathetic consideration to some way to replace or make up for the loss of the funds which enactment of the constitutional amendment he proposes would force upon my State. At least, I solicit his sympathetic consideration in that connection.

Mr. President, the Congress should be concerned with the quality of the electorate; but the failure to pass a Federal-aid bill over all of these years that such a bill had been considered indicates that this concern is not very deep. Admiral Rickover, the father of the atomic submarine, and one of the Nation's most incisive commentators on our educational system, in a speech in Chicago last October made some very cogent comments on education in a democracy.

Mr. President, Admiral Rickover is, I believe, one of the few persons for whom the Congress itself intervened and, we might say, overrode the military brass, by conferring upon him a great honor; and that action was entirely nonpartisan, and was an innate, instinctive recognition by Congress of his great ability. In the speech which Admiral Rickover made last October in Chicago he said:

> I suggest that political education should consist of a carefully planned course of studies in history, government, geography, economics and literature, continuing through elementary and secondary school and designed to awaken youth to an appreciation of the value of democracy and of its meaning. Children who are familiar with the tragic story of mankind's long and bitter struggle for political freedom, so rarely crowned with success, are not likely to take their privileges for granted. They will recognize them for the priceless heritage they are and wish to pass them on to future generations. These studies also help youth shed the childish notion that one can go through life demanding rights without recognizing the necessity of giving something in return. A child takes his first step toward political maturity when he understands that in the adult world right and obligation are correlative ideas. The next step is to rise above infantile dreams that look upon government as a cow that magically produces milk without being appropriately nourished. In reality all public disbursements come out of the pockets of the people. The account will be balanced either in a fair and orderly way through taxes or in a cruel and inequitable way through inflation.
>
> The student will have attained full political maturity when he realizes that he is personally responsible for making democracy work; that he has no alibi if his country is badly governed; when he overcomes the myopia that afflicts persons who are wholly centered on self; when he attains the long-range vision that lets him see that the national interest is part and parcel of his own personal interest. There can be no real conflict between national and private interest when sovereignty is vested in the people. Only badly educated voters willingly turn their nation into a weak pressure group state.

Mr. President, that passage brings to mind what is likely to be the next step if this misbegotten measure is passed—and that is to try to establish a uniform literacy test for voting. I think the entire passage I have read just now from the speech made by Admiral Rickover has considerable pertinence to that issue. And the passage of the measure now being urged upon us would amount to the removal of a further link in our constitutional system, which has served us quite well.

In his speech, Admiral Rickover continued as follows:

> Our schools are much concerned with developing democratic and friendly attitudes in children and familiarizing them with parliamentary procedure; this is all to the good. But it is even more important to develop in them an attitude combining firm devotion to basic political principles, with flexibility toward means for attaining them. If we want to preserve our political principles, we must periodically reexamine and bring up to date the machinery through which these principles are put into effect.
>
> Any program of political education for our children must keep in mind that the public virtues we must nurture in American youth are on the one hand self-reliance and independence of spirit, on the other hand readiness to cooperate, to accept the verdict of the polls, and if it goes against you, to act as a loyal opposition. Central to our concept of a free society is the autonomous individual who uses government as a means whereby he joins with fellow citizens in the pursuit of common ends. Government is not an alien "they" to him. He cannot indulge in the luxury of blaming what they do, for sovereignty is vested in him and it is he who has voted into office the men who govern him.

Nor should he fear or mistrust his Government for it is the only agency in his society over which he has effective control, and this is as true of Federal as of local or State government. There should be no conflict in his mind between the dependence of Government on his consent and the power of Government to enforce the law. He must obey the laws. If he deems them unjust, he is free to combine with like-minded citizens and elect men who will change bad laws. He must submit to being governed by persons who have been entrusted with legislative, executive, or judicial powers of Government, but he reserves the right to scrutinize their performance and to criticize it in public.

This right to scrutinize and criticize extends to all agencies of Government, including tax-supported public schools and universities. Educators sometimes forget that they are public officials, as when they deride criticism or claim that only professional educators have a right to judge the performance of the school. In our free society no public agency may demand to be exempt from public judgment. Were this not so, our liberties would soon vanish. Citizens in free societies safeguard their freedom in private life by their very participation in public life. The people themselves are the guardians of their several inalienable rights, each citizen being in truth the keeper of his brother's liberties. The Nation's business is the business of every one of us. It is our right and duty to talk on public issues after we have examined them and thought about them to our best ability. Schools that provide life or group adjustment instead of genuine education, people and institutions who attempt to degrade free, self-determining citizens into conforming organization men and vilify critics of the status quo—whether they know it or not, they all are busily at work eroding the very foundations of our free society.

Mr. President, there is a pressing need for improvement at all levels of our educational system. In May of last year in the Senate I made some remarks on the Federal aid to education bill, which I wish to recall:

Our people must not only be trained in ever increasingly difficult technical skills, but also in the development of those human traits which make up the political, economic, and social man. It is not enough if our scientists are experts in their technical field but know nothing outside and beyond their specialty. The degree of development in technical skills will not be the factor that determines our future. Our society's future will be molded by our success in creating self-discipline in our young people and imbuing them with an understanding of American traditions and institutions. According to Herbert Spencer, the overall object of education is the development of character. The quality of the character developed by our educational system in turn determines our national character.

The need for an educated citizenry is more crucial today than ever before. The world has entered an era of great instability filled with both dangers and promises. Great changes are taking place daily which are shaping the future world which our children will inherit. Remarkable advancements are being made in all fields of science—from the development of the power to split the atom to a cure for polio. Scientists have opened new vistas of knowledge which can be applied either to destroy civilization or to cure many of the problems of mankind. At the same time, our capacity for understanding and getting along peacefully in the world has not kept pace and—if anything—has deteriorated. Whether we use this fund of knowledge for mankind's benefit or his doom will, in large measure, be determined by what kind of educational system we have.

If our youth are to be equipped to cope with this complex world, we must improve our educational system at all levels. It is not enough to educate them for adjustment to present conditions. They must be armed with knowledge which will enable them to shape and master the future.

Charles E. Silberman has summed up the requirements of a modern education system, as follows:

"To be practical, an education now must prepare a man for work that doesn't yet exist and whose nature can't even be imagined. This can be done only by teaching people how to learn, by giving them the kind of intellectual discipline and the depth of understanding that will enable them to apply man's accumulated wisdom to new conditions as they arise."

The demands on our educational system were never greater and, if they are to be met, we must have a drastic revision in our sense of values.

In our society we must make sure that every individual has the means to develop his full intellectual potential. A quality education should be available to every boy and girl, whether he or she is from Arkansas or California. Waste in human resources is too costly in a democracy. The uneducated or undereducated man is not only incapable of being an effective participant in the democratic process, but also does not make his fair contribution to economic progress.

Education and economic progress go hand in hand. Each is essential to the other. Education more than any other factor raises the productivity of a nation—and of the individual. Industry today is more dependent on education than ever before. Automation—and technological progress in general—dramatized the vulnerability of the uneducated man to machine competition. In order to meet the challenge of this new industrial era, our educational system must be revised and updated.

The makeup of our labor force is changing rapidly, reflecting new technological developments. Occupations requiring a high educational level are expanding rapidly, while those requiring little education are contracting. The reasons for this trend were well stated by Dean Francis Chase of the University of Chicago when he said:

"The qualities essential to employability and productivity are coming closer and closer to the characteristics that have long been attributed to the educated person."

In 1910, considerable education was required of only a third of the labor force. This has now risen to one-half the labor force. The day is approaching rapidly when the man with only his energy to sell will have nothing to sell. Obviously, it would be a waste of time and money to give every young person a college education. But we can insure that every person has a chance, and is encouraged to develop his full intellectual capacity. If we do less, we shall be wasting the Nation's most valuable asset—the brainpower of its youth.

Mr. President, it goes without saying that the primary responsibility for operation and administration of the schools must continue to remain with the State and local governments. This fact, however, does not detract from the need for more attention to education on the national level. In 1960 almost 21 percent of those taking the selective service mental test failed to pass. I am sorry to report that 47 percent of the young men from Arkansas failed this test. This is a shockingly high percentage. It indicates not only the need for a renewed effort nationally in the field of education, but also the tremendous job that must be done in bringing the school systems of the underdeveloped States, such as Arkansas, up to a par with the national average. We have a long way to go in this country in bringing the educational level of our citizens up to where it should be in a representative form of government such as ours.

At this point I invite the attention of my colleagues to an interesting article which appeared in the May 7, 1961, issue of the Washington Post. This article, entitled "The Anatomy of Unemployment," clearly shows the relationship between lack of education and the unemployment problem. The subtitle, "Our Technology Outruns Education," is well chosen. Senators, especially those from the more industrialized States, will, I believe, be interested in some of the points brought out in this article. I read from the article:

THE ANATOMY OF UNEMPLOYMENT—OUR TECHNOLOGY OUTRUNS EDUCATION

(By Frank C. Porter)

In the play "Tobacco Road," Jeeter Lester let a handful of arid, wornout soil trickle through his fingers.

It was worthless land, he said—couldn't even grow turnips on it anymore. But it was his land, the land on which he had grown up and his daddy before him. Jeeter would be damned if he'd ever leave it.

If Jeeter Lester couldn't hoe turnips, anymore, what could he do? Operate a turret lathe, design missile parts, program a computer, manage a laundromat? No, none of these. He was too old to retrain for even the most simple semiskilled jobs. And even if he were younger, the training might not take.

Most of America's 4.9 million unemployed are not Jeeter Lesters. But for a great many of them, his quandary is theirs. And it illustrates the lack of human mobility and skills which underlie this Nation's chronic unemployment problem.

With most economists agreed that the recession bottomed out in February or March, the unemployment picture has brightened somewhat. The jobless total is down from 5.5 million 2 months ago and the unemployment rate of 6.8 percent is off slightly from the 6.9 percent recorded in the recession trough.

But no matter how bright the economic skies become, a hard core of substantial unemployment is expected to remain. After each of three preceding recessions, U.S. unemployment has leveled off on a progressively higher plateau—at approximately 2.5 percent of the labor force in 1952–53, at 3.8 in 1956–57, at about 4.7 in 1959–60.

The Kennedy administration has made unemployment countermeasures its first order of domestic business. But its approach is two-pronged. Part of today's joblessness—but only part—has been caused by the economic downturn from which we are just emerging, it believes. The remainder is chronic and the result of longer term influences.

Idle workers can be broken down into a number of groups:

Unemployables, who for various reasons—alcoholism, recurrent illness, laziness, a compulsion to punch every foreman on the nose—simply can't hold down a job for long.

The so-called frictionally unemployed—mostly those workers who are between jobs.

Cyclically unemployed—victims of the business cycle who are let go when the consumer slows his buying pace and when inflated inventories call for production cutbacks.

Those affected by a shift in demand. As the public changes its buying habits—purchasing more boats and fewer automobiles, say—a particular industry may have to lay off employees permanently by the thousands.

Those affected by a geographical shift. Textile firms, in pursuit of lower taxes and cheaper labor, deserted New England for the South, leaving thousands of unemployed in their wake.

The technologically unemployed.

The latter three factors are generally considered responsible for the bulk of chronic or structural unemployment.

And of the three, the technological factor is the most disquieting. Experts disagree over automation. Some, notably labor economists, feel that it is bringing a net decrease in the number of jobs available to industrial workers. Others insist that it will create more jobs than it destroys.

But no one can argue against its current impact. In 1947, for example, 649,000 production workers turned out 4.8 million motor vehicles; last year 612,000 workers produced 7.9 million.

Ten years ago the steel industry needed 540,000 men to produce 96.8 million tons of raw steel; last year 99.3 million tons were turned out with only 462,000 workers.

Machines will eliminate some 4 million office and clerical jobs in the next 5 years, according to a report compiled by Representative ELMER J. HOLLAND, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, for President Kennedy last February.

Robots which will displace thousands of assembly line and packaging workers are already in production. Computers run entire oil refineries and chemical plants with only a few men needed to handle the controls.

The vending machine industry has put its ingenuity to work developing devices that eliminate theater ticket sellers, parimutuel window operators, department store clerks, lunch counter personnel, cashiers, mutual fund salesmen, and a great many others.

Front loaders are eliminating the man with the shovel; mechanical crop pickers are displacing field hands; bootblacks are losing out to mechanical shoe cleaners.

And yet, in the midst of all this, jobs go begging, go begging by the thousands.

A knowledgeable report by the Wall Street Journal last week told how the Illinois State Employment Service is having trouble filling eight clerical vacancies on its own staff. Its counterpart in Cleveland says it is unable to fill 1,000 jobs each month, mainly in the clerical and sales fields.

The motel industry is sounding an urgent call for at least 90,000 new employees during 1961.

The United States is short at least 250,000 auto mechanics and nobody is training anyone, the Good Car Keeping Institute complains, despite thousands of laid-off auto production workers who could easily be converted.

The fast-growing computer services industry clamors for programers and is training high school students to relieve the shortage. In the next decade, more than 200,000 more programers will be needed, it is estimated.

The same conditions obtain in a dozen fields: In teaching, in engineering, in top level executive positions, in sales.

The paradox is easily answerable. Most of today's unemployed are not qualified to fill the hundreds of thousands of unfilled jobs.

The Wall Street Journal offered statistics showing that the rate of unemployment among professional and technical personnel in March was only 1.6 percent, less than the amount usually attributed to frictional unemployment alone.

The rate among clerical personnel was 4.9 percent; among skilled workers, 9.1; the semiskilled, 12.1; and unskilled workers, 19.1 percent.

This would tend to show that the chances of unemployment are inversely proportional to a worker's educational level.

Officials within the Kennedy administration have been discussing ways and means of training, retraining, and even relocating displaced workers. A concrete step was taken a few weeks ago when Labor Secretary Arthur J. Goldberg set up an Office of Automation and Manpower, one job of which would be to help relocate and retrain workers for new jobs.

The task may be too monumental, however, for any single agency or even for the massed resources of the entire Federal Government. The root of the problem is in the very heart of our educational system and in the aims and attitudes of 180 million Americans.

As the Wall Street Journal suggests, the problem of school dropouts is a major factor contributing to the serious shortage in specialized skills. Until recently, the dropout was considered the special province of the sociologist; now he has become the concern of the economist.

The Labor Department estimates that of the 26 million persons from 14 to 24 entering the labor force in the 1960's, some 7.5 million or 30 percent will not have completed high school. And of these, 2.5 million won't even have a grade school education.

These 7.5 million youths will find jobs increasingly tough to come by. Most of the work they could have done a generation ago will not longer exist; much of it will be done by machine. Meanwhile, as many of them join the ranks of the unemployed, the need for qualified persons to design and build and run and program the machines will become more and more acute. Far from being just a sociological problem, the dropout will prove a drag on the Nation's economy and its potential for growth.

In essence, this Nation's technology has outrun its education. We have built a machine that promised to save us labor and create more leisure. Now we must work and think harder than ever before to keep it going.

Mr. President, the retraining bill retraining bill recently signed into law indicates that Congress is concerned about the human displacements caused by our growing technology. But it does not go to the root of the problem, which is education geared to meet the needs of a highly complex economy.

In recent weeks there has been much public discussion about school dropouts. A recent report by the Arkansas State Department of Education indicates that about 70 percent of the Arkansas students entering the first grade do not complete high school. This is a frightening situation which cannot help but act as an oppressive drag on Arkansas efforts to build a more prosperous economy.

The problems of meeting the demands on our educational system will get worse before they get better. The school age group since 1950 has grown twice as fast as the total population. Public school enrollment last fall reached a new high of 37.5 million and is expected to go up by more than 1 million next fall. President Kennedy, in his recent message on education, said that by 1970 the Nation must provide facilities for 14 million more elementary, secondary school, and college students.

In 1949 an estimated $5 billion was spent for public elementary and secondary education. This increased to almost $17 billion in the last school year. Although expenditures have tripled in a little over 10 years, it is expected that more than $30 billion will be required in the 1968–69 school year just to maintain existing standards. The Rockefeller report on education pointed out that, in spite of the fact that educational expenditures are rising rapidly, the percent of gross national product devoted to education has remained relatively constant at about 3.5 percent since 1930. The net result has been that there is a smaller expenditure of the GNP per pupil proportionately today due to the rapid rise in enrollments. We still spend as much on tobacco and alcohol and over twice as much on purchase and operation of automobiles as we do on public elementary and secondary education. It would be interesting to know what historians several centuries from now will say about nation that spends three times as much on its Military Establishment as on its public schools.

The status of teachers in our public schools is a national disgrace. They are woefully underpaid and overworked. It is not surprising, in view of the low status of teachers, that we have such serious difficulties in attracting and retaining qualified teachers. An Office of Education report stated that 89,700 or 6.1 percent of the teachers in public elementary and secondary schools did not meet full certification standards this year. It is surprising that the number is not larger, in view of our complacency toward the teaching profession. Until we give teachers true professional status and salaries commensurate with their positions, we cannot hope to attract the best talent available.

I have spent considerable time today discussing education because I firmly believe that this is a subject that should receive priority attention from the Congress this year, although there is little hope that it will be accorded this status. The question of whether or not five States are to be deprived of their right to levy a poll tax is an inconsequential issue in comparison to the Nation's educational problems. Although the Southern States, which are still suffering from the effects of the Civil War, need financial assistance for the schools more than any other section, there is still an obvious need for the improvement in the educational systems of the more prosperous States—particularly those in the North whose representatives in the Congress are so quick to find fault with the people from my section. There is a particularly urgent need to bring about better education in the North on the meaning of the Constitution.

The poll tax issue is only a Trojan horse which will inevitably lead to demands for passage of other measures aimed at the South. We are already on notice that an effort will be made to abolish the poll tax by statute. In a few weeks the Senate will be confronted with a proposal to establish a uniform literacy test. No doubt a multitude of other unconstitutional and unwarranted measures designed to embarrass the people of the South and curry votes from minority groups in the North will be presented during the course of that debate.

I, for one, am weary of the meaningless ritual which so-called civil rights proponents force this body to go through every year. It is a waste of time, effort, and the taxpayers' money—and the public business suffers. But there seems to be no escaping this annual effort to purge the South of supposed evils and bad habits. I submit, Mr. President, that the people of the South are no more or no less pure at heart than citizens in any other section of our land. Every section of the Nation has its peculiar problems of human relations. But these problems cannot be solved by passage of a law but only through passage of time and a constantly improving educational system.

As I have said before, there is no evidence that the poll tax is used as a device to prevent Negroes from voting. Even if it were used in this manner, the Federal Government has more than ample authority to protect the constitutional rights of any citizen who has been wronged. Even before passage of the voting rights laws of 1957 and 1960 there was a multiude of statutes on the books which were designed to guarantee enforcement of every individual's constitutional rights. Discrimination and bias cannot be legislated away. As long as human beings act like human beings there will be discrimination and bias. The Members of this body would do well to remember that we cannot legislate goodness.

In closing, I refer again to Dean Storey's comment in the recent report of the Civil Rights Commission on voting. He said:

> Proposals to alter longstanding Federal-State relationships such as that incorporated in the Federal Constitution, declaring that the qualifications of electors shall be left to the several States, should not be made unless there is no alternative method to correct an existing evil. Such is not the case today.
>
> The Federal Government has sufficient authority under the Constitution and the existing framework of laws to enable it effectively to deal with denials of the right to vote by reason of race, color, religion, and national origin.

I hope that Members of the Senate will heed his advice.

Mr. President, I certainly hope the Senate will not consider the joint resolution.

STOCKPILE INVENTORIES

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, several weeks ago the President of the United States in his press conference called our attention to the fact that the Nation has an unnecessarily large inventories in its stockpile. The President made the statement that he thought when all the facts concerning its acquisition had been fully exposed to the American people it would border on a national scandal. He inferred that there had been many instances of unconscionable profits and abuses.

I complimented the President at that time on the fact that he was going to roll the wraps of secrecy from this program. I think the time is long overdue when the American people should be told since in many instances hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent for unnecessary items accumulated in the stockpile. Prices for items many times have been far in excess of market value and far in excess of the prices which were necessary to be paid.

In an effort to get more information on this program, under date of February 9, 1962, I directed a letter to Mr. Bernard L. Boutin, the Administrator of General Services Administration. In the letter I asked for an itemized breakdown showing the amounts of Government inventories of items in the so-called strategic stockpile which are in excess of that amount which has been certified as essential for defense requirements.

I emphasized in the letter that in the report I wished to have not only the quantity and the cost to the Federal Government of the commodities when procured but also an estimate of the annual storage cost. I asked for the report to show how much of each commodity was currently under contract for future procurement and the present price being paid.

In the request for information I emphasized to the Administrator of General Services Administration that I was asking only for this information on those items in our national stockpile which were in excess of our stockpiling needs. Therefore I saw no reason why such information should be classified. Certainly the committee which has been set up by the U.S. Senate upon the request of the President to investigate this program cannot do a good job until at least the committee and the Senate know how much of these inventories there are on hand in excess of our needs. The Congress cannot plan an intelligent program of selling these commodities which are in excess of our national defense needs until there is some knowledge as to how many of these commodities are on hand.

I have been officially advised that there is no reason why there should be any classification of secrecy on this information.

Under date of March 6, I received a complete report from the Administrator of General Services Administration in which he answered the questions I had asked and in which he gave a complete breakdown of the inventories in excess of our stockpiling needs. This report shows the quantities on hand in the national stockpile, the quantities under the Defense Production Act, that which is under the Commodity Credit Corporation barter agreement, that which is under the supplemental program, and some left over from the RFC. The report also gives a detailed breakdown of the cost along with the present market values.

All of these different programs must be taken into consideration when one figures how much there is on hand of each item. To release the information on that which is held under only one part of the stockpile program would give the wrong impression not only to the Congress but also to the American people. All of this information concerning all the programs should be released at one time so that when we speak of how much aluminum, lead, zinc, or other item there is on hand we shall know how much there is on hand as a total, not merely a total for one particular agency.

I have all this information and wish it were possible to put it in the RECORD. Much to my regret, however, the information is marked "secret," even to the extent that it is considered dangerous if Mr. Khrushchev should find out how much castor oil there is on hand over and above what we need.

Perhaps it is thought the small fry of our country will feel more secure knowing that the Government has an excessive stockpile of castor oil to take care of any emergency needs.

To show the complete absurdity of the classification, they have even classified the storage costs on the items.

I have talked with officials in the executive branch, including officials of GSA. They agree that the information could be properly declassified and insist it will be done. For the last several days they have been saying, "Tomorrow I think it will be declassified."

I noticed on the ticker this afternoon that information on our stockpiling program has been declassified, but I quote from the wire service report:

> The information will be made public later at the first meeting of the Symington committee.

In this same release several items are listed which are proposed to be removed from the cloak of secrecy. I supported the establishment of the Symington committee. I think that this investigation is needed. I was glad that the President was interested in telling the American people all of the facts. I still support the committee. But I do not see why, when we as Members of the Senate obtain information, a cloak of secrecy should be placed on such information with instructions that we can discuss it only after it has been officially released through a congressional committee.

I do not think we have to set up a congressional committee and waste the time of the staff and the members of the committee to call a special hearing in order to make available to the public information which could be incorporated in the RECORD by unanimous consent. We have all of that information here, and it certainly does not require a congressional committee to make it available to the public.

Certainly the ability of the members of the committee can be put to a better use. We do not need a congressional investigation to find out how much of providing for the establishing of the former dwelling house of Alexander Hamilton as a national monument.

Any Recipe Suff. Sonit

ATE 3/27/62 March 27

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the pending amendment an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which is at the desk and is identified as 3–15–62–B.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to state the amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with, and that the text of it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the text of the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Congress finds that the requirement that a poll tax or other tax be paid, or that any property qualification be met, as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, is not and shall not be deemed a qualification of voters or electors voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for said officers, within the meaning of the Constitution, but is and shall be deemed an interference with the manner of holding primaries and elections for said national officers, an abridgment of the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States, a tax on such rights and privileges, an obstruction of the operations of the Federal Government, and an impairment of the republican form of government.

"SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any State, municipality, or other governmental authority or any subdivision thereof, or for any person, whether or not acting on behalf of any State, municipality, other governmental authority or subdivision thereof, to levy, collect, or require the payment of any poll tax or other tax or to impose a property qualification as a prerequisite for registering to vote or voting in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, elector for President or Vice President, or Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, or otherwise to interfere with or prevent any person from registering to vote or voting in any such election by reason of such person's failure or refusal to pay or assume the obligation of paying any poll tax or other such tax or meeting any property qualification. Any such levy, collection or requirement, and any such tax or property qualification, shall be invalid and void insofar as it purports to disqualify any person otherwise qualified from voting at such primary or other election."

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution to protect the right to vote in national elections by making unlawful the requirement that a poll tax be paid as a prerequisite to voting in such elections, and for other purposes."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the amendment is offered on behalf of myself and Senators DOUGLAS, KEATING, BUSH, HART, NEUBERGER, CASE of New Jersey, PASTORE, SCOTT, ALLOTT, MORSE, PROXMIRE, BEALL, WILLIAMS of New Jer- and KUCHEL.

President, the amendment I would ute for the constitutional amend- ch is now before the Senate is of a statute eliminating the poll tax in elections for Federal Government officials.

I am well aware of the intention of the majority leader to move to table this particular substitute. Nonetheless, I have offered it because I feel very deeply that if we are to do anything, after the pain and anguish which we always go through in these matters, let us do something now instead of deferring the day when we will do something.

Aside from every other argument on this subject—and this has been a matter of disputation for a very considerable period of time—the argument which seems to be most persuasive is this: If we pass a constitutional amendment and it is approved by the States, we will still have to be back here to pass a statute, because no amendment to the Constitution is self-operative. We must pass a law to implement it. Therefore, why go through all of this circumlocution if we can constitutionally—and I believe it is now clear beyond peradventure that it can be done—do the same thing by statute now? Do we want a repetition of the events of the last 2 weeks, if it is completely unnecessary?

The constitutional amendment technique has been with us for 14 years. We actually passed it in the Senate in 1960, but nothing has happened. So here we are again with the same constitutional amendment at this session.

On the other hand, in the House, on five successive occasions, there has been passed a simple statute to outlaw the poll tax. If we had seen fit on any one of those occasions to do exactly as the other body had done, the matter would long since have been settled. May it be said to the credit of this body that this was attempted on one occasion. In 1945 the Judiciary Committee actually reported to the Senate a bill which is very similar to the one I have offered today, which would have outlawed the poll tax in respect of elections for Federal officials. However, that bill ran afoul of extended debate, as it is euphemistically called, and cloture was not successful; so the matter fell by the wayside.

Mr. President, the first point of argument is, Why should we try to do it by constitutional amendment, when we will have to pass a statute ultimately anyhow, and when we can enact legislation right now? I shall go into that question in some detail later.

The same matter was debated and discussed and voted upon in 1960, at which time the Senate voted to table this statutory approach by a vote of 50 to 37. However, since that time we have had the experience of having passed a constitutional amendment which, when it went to the other body, got nowhere. I do not know what will happen to this one, but I do know that if we pass it as a statute now we have assurance that it will be passed by the House, by reason of the fact that on five successive occasions in the other body such a statutory method has been adopted and enacted. Consequently, a provision outlawing the poll tax is more likely to be enacted this time as a statute than as a constitutional amendment.

I repeat, first, the most important point is that we will have to pass a statute anyhow sooner or later; therefore, we might as well do it now, since we have the power to do it.

Secondly, as to the chances for enacting a constitutional amendment, let us remember that there are 11 States which either have the poll tax now or have had it in the very recent past. So we start with that problem. We also have the fact that 11 States did not ratify our last previous constitutional amendment, giving to residents of the District of Columbia the right to vote in presidential elections. We have also the fact that a considerable number of States—12 to be exact—disqualify paupers or inmates of charitable institutions from voting. It strikes me that when we take the 11 and add to that number—and then we need only 2 more—the 12 States which have laws preventing paupers or inmates of charitable institutions from voting, we are running some risk that a minority of the country, both as to the number of States and as to population, may frustrate the whole design of Congress. Therefore, I believe we must ask ourselves the logical question: Why do it the hard way? Why not do it the direct way which is available to us, and in which the other body has time and again shown a disposition to join?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I should like merely to add one sentence. Then I will be very glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, I must, of course, demonstrate—as I shall now undertake to do—that to take the statutory course is permitted by the Constitution, because whether it can be tested or not, we are too responsible to move in that way unless we are convinced the Constitution allows it. So I shall now attempt to demonstrate that to the Senate.

I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. What reason does the Senator have for thinking that the States which have pauper statutes, so-called, would be interested in defeating this amendment?

Mr. JAVITS. I think any of the States which have pauper statutes may be interested in defeating the amendment. It will be argued in more detail in respect to the Senator's amendment when we reach that part of the debate, assuming that I do not succeed, but it may very well be that those States which have that kind of provision may entertain some doubt about continuing under their laws. They may say, "This is an out on that score because of doubt as to what that may or may not mean"; and hence they may find an interest in not ratifying the amendment in order to continue their own laws with respect to paupers.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator knows, does he not, that we struck out of section 1 the reference to property qualifications?

Mr. JAVITS. I do not want to deal with that in full at this point because property disqualification can and will be discussed, I am sure, in connection with the constitutional amendment, and raises some questions. I was only trying to answer specifically the Senator's question as to what States might be against this proposal.

Mr. HOLLAND. I cannot follow the Senator's logic. When we strike out of section 1 the only thing that related to section 2, by striking out the property qualification provision, I do not see how the pauper provisions of the 12 States involved could have any application at all to this amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. I am not trying to apply the constitutional amendment proposal to the State laws; I am only trying to apply the acid test to the proposal: Whether we are likely to have the amendment approved by three-fourths of the States. I point out that a number of States have an interest because of those laws to let the Constitution remain as it is.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator think there is anything in the amendment which would interfere with those States or the pauper provisions?

Mr. JAVITS. I would rather not pass upon that question until the questions of exclusion and inclusion raised by the Senator have been dealt with in the debate, as I feel certain they will be.

The question of constitutionality, which is involved in the statutory substitute I am offering, has been very much discussed; but I think constitutionality is firmly based upon a number of grounds, all of which are recited in my amendment itself, in which the Congress finds as a fact that the poll tax is an attempt to interfere with the manner of holding elections and primaries, a tax on primaries, an abridgment of rights and privileges of citizens of the United States, a tax on such rights and privileges, an obstruction of the operations of the Federal Government, and an impairment of the republican form of government. This relates to the various elements of the Constitution upon which I depend in urging the constitutionality of such an approach as this.

The first question is: Is the poll tax a qualification for voting within the language of the Constitution, article I, section 2, which gives the States power? Or is it a regulation as to time, place, or manner within article I, section 4, which expressly authorizes the Congress to act? The word "qualification" has been defined time and again in the Congress. Interestingly enough, I find the most exact definition in a message sent by the Governor of South Carolina to his own legislature in 1947, urging the legislature to repeal the poll tax. In his message, the Governor of South Carolina said:

> There has been much misguided agitation about the poll tax as a qualification for voting. Capacity, in accordance with the other constitutional provisions, to exercise the right of franchise should be the only qualification of an elector.

In short, what the Governor was really saying was that any kind of financial or property prerequisite for voting is not a qualification. He himself defines the word "qualification" as synonymous with the concept of capacity. It seems to me that that concept is borne out by the cases, particularly the one case upon which the proponents of the constitutional amendment theory constantly rely, the case of Breedlove v. Suttles (302 U.S. 277), decided in 1937. There the Supreme Court refers throughout to the poll tax not as a qualification for voting—or, to use the words of the Governor of South Carolina, as relating to capacity—but as a "prerequisite of voting."

I respectfully submit that treated as a prerequisite, as a condition precedent for voting, it falls far more within the time, place, and manner of holding elections, over which article I, section 4, of the Constitution gives Congress the power, than it does within the term "qualifications," over which article I, section 2, gives the States power.

This is also borne out by other cases which have been decided by the Supreme Court under article I, section 4. But I find a very interesting reference with respect to it in the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, when he testified the other day before a subcommittee of the other body, in which the main thrust of his testimony was with respect to literacy. The Attorney General, when he argued the question with respect to the poll tax, said that the statutory method for eliminating the poll tax was in his opinion just as valid an exercise of congressional authority as it was with respect to literacy. However, he said that the administration preferred the constitutional amendment approach; and so he said he preferred that method. But he said, as a basic and organic element of his opinion, that the statutory method for outlawing the poll tax was just as effective and valid as it was with respect to literacy.

The cases which can be cited in support of that process go back to 1879. I refer to Ex parte Siebold (100 U.S. 371) in which there were convictions for ballot-box stuffing under Federal criminal law. The convictions were upheld on the ground that Congress has the power to assume the entire regulation of the election of Representatives and may, as it did in that criminal election fraud statute, undertake only partial regulation.

A very important aspect of that case—and it is true of a whole series of cases—is the proposition that under article I, section 4, State regulation applies only unless and until Congress steps in, and then only to the extent that those State regulations are not superseded by Federal law. So it is plain that Federal law can be effective notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court has upheld the poll tax. The Supreme Court upheld a State poll tax statute in the Breedlove case, to which I referred, on the ground that it was not discriminatory on its face; the statute made distinctions as to women and certain other categories of voters who were exempt, but that was before Congress stepped into the situation and, in terms of its own authority, there is a whole line of cases which holds that so long as Congress does not assert its authority, State regulations may remain in effect and may, indeed, be constitutional without contravening the power of Congress, when Congress chooses to exercise it.

I cite next the case of Davis v. Ohio (241 U.S. 565), which dealt with redistricting in that State. There, again, the Supreme Court stated that Congress had the express power to prohibit the way in which redistricting had been done by the State so long as the Congress chose to exercise that power. Since the Congress had not chosen to exercise the power, the Court held, the State retained the power. A similar was Smiley v. Holm (285 U.S. 355), in which the Court stated that Congress has a general supervisory power over the whole subject of Congressional elections.

The most convincing case in terms of the authority that we are discussing today is United States against Classic, in which convictions were upheld under a Federal statute prohibiting the denial of rights secured by the Constitution for altering ballots cast in a primary election. The question was whether constitutional guarantees applied to primary elections. In that case, the Court said, at page 310:

> Such right as is secured by the Constitution to qualified voters to choose Members of the House of Representatives is thus to be exercised in conformity to the requirements of State law subject to the restrictions prescribed by section 2 and to the authority conferred on Congress by section 4, to regulate times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives.

And at page 315:

> While, in a loose sense, the right to vote for Representatives in Congress is sometimes spoken of as a right derived from the State [citations omitted], this statement is true only in the sense that the States are authorized, by the Constitution, to legislate on the subject as provided by section 2 of article I, to the extent that Congress has not restricted State action by the exercise of its powers to regulate elections under section 4 and its more general power under article I, section 8, clause 18 of the Constitution "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

Madam President (Mrs. NEUBERGER in the chair), it has also been argued—and quite properly, I think—that under present conditions the poll tax is an abridgment of the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States. One of those rights and privileges is the right to vote for Federal officials; and it seems to me that the imposition of a tax on any such right is clearly an abridgment of the rights and privileges of citizens.

It is argued that there were property qualifications in the States at the time of ratification of the Constitution, and that they were not considered as anything other than the normal course of events at that time. But the difficulty lies in the contrast between the situation of the country then and the situation today, when the passage of time has made us feel that the voting right should not be encumbered either by a property qualification or by any financial consideration, and that Congress can assert that the developments in our whole social order now result in making what may formerly have been considered tolerable as an institution, an encumbrance under present conditions and an abridgment of the rights of citizens to exercise their rights and privileges as citizens of the United States.

And finally there is the constitutional provision—one not too often construed—which relates to the duty of the Federal Government to provide for every State a republican form of government.

It will be noted that in this discussion of constitutionality—which I repeat is mainly premised on the two points of the times, places, and manner of holding Federal elections, which are clearly within the power of Congress, and upon the obstruction of, or imposition of a burden on, the right to exercise one's rights and privileges as a citizen of the United States—there is yet another point, namely, the way in which the poll tax has worked to discriminate against Negroes in the exercise of the voting right, so that Congress has power to act under the 15th amendment.

We do not have as much evidence on this subject as we have with respect to use of the literacy test as a means of discriminating in connection with voting. However, we are by no means without evidence on this subject. For instance, it is very interesting to me to note that the Senator from Florida, in arguing in favor of his amendment, has always argued as a fact, and has given figures from his own State to show, that removal of the poll tax has had a material effect in increasing the number of voters there and also in increasing the number of those who seek to vote. I think that is a most important argument, and it is an additional plea in favor of adoption of this proposed constitutional amendment.

But on the negative side, and in regard to use of the poll tax for purposes of discrimination, I should like to refer first to the 1961 report of the Civil Rights Commission on voting, at page 162:

> A striking situation exists in one of the eight counties, Issaquena, Miss., where no Negroes are registered to vote. A wealthy Negro landowner and merchant pays more than $2,000 taxes annually to his county, and when bond issues are approved by the white electorate, he carries a large share of the financial burden. Yet, he says, as consistently as he proffers his $2 poll tax along with his other taxes, it is refused by the collector.

Let us remember that in most of these States, the poll tax has to be paid long before the time to register and the time to vote. Hence, the poll tax is a tipoff to the authorities that a particular Negro may have decided that he wants to vote; and then all the machinery is set in motion to discourage him from what some in that area consider to be a very bad idea.

Madam President, in the testimony recently taken before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the other body in regard to the poll tax, there was evidence from two citizens of Mississippi; and I should like to read part of that evidence, if I may, to my colleagues, because it gives some idea of how the poll tax is used. The chairman of the committee was addressing Mr. Smith, a witness:

> The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any experience to indicate that? Did you do any checking on records or have you had the experience to indicate that the removal of the poll tax would be a great improvement relative to the number of Negroes who can register and vote?

Mr. SMITH. Maybe I could substantiate this with an experience in Holmes County—that is in central Mississippi. The county seat is about fifty miles from the State Capital, which is Jackson, where I live.

There is a small college operated for Negroes there. They have students from thirteen foreign countries. The president of that college is a Negro woman, Dr. Mallorey, well educated. She has traveled around the world and knows her way around.

She has a farm about 2 miles from the school. She sent the check for her taxes on her farm, and included $2 to pay her poll tax. The man who is chief deputy sheriff now—his wife at present is the Sheriff—the man who is chief deputy sheriff—he served the last time and his wife succeeded him—sent the check back and everything and he used language that I would feel embarrassed to use before this committee.

But in substance finally he said—he didn't use words that are worthy of repeating in your presence, but it had references to Negro citizens paying their poll taxes.

He said when he got ready for them to pay them, he would send for them. Not one single Negro in that county—and in connection with that, Negroes constitute the majority of the population in that county.

And so forth. So that is another factual example.

Also, Madam President, the Department of Justice has instituted litigation on the ground that the poll tax is being used as a means of discriminating against Negro voters in Tallahatchie County, Miss. The title of the case is United States against Dogan. The district court has denied a motion by the Government for a preliminary injunction on the ground that no good faith effort was made to pay the poll tax. But again I cite this instance to lend some factual basis—which I think very clearly exists—for the point that payment of the poll tax can be used, and as a matter of fact is used, as one of a number of means of discrimination in connection with the exercise of the right to vote.

Madam President, in a social sense—and I believe it important to analyze this aspect—the poll tax is certainly a discouragement to voting, especially in the areas and upon those whom it affects with the greatest impact. Although the poll tax is not large in amount, the difference between the amount of income enjoyed by citizens who do vote and the amount of income of citizens who apparently can very easily be discouraged from voting is very marked. For example, the national figures show that in 1956 the average per capita income of white citizens was $2,917, whereas the average income for individual nonwhite citizens was $1,075. These are figures from the 1960 Bureau of the Census report.

Also, when one looks at the rates of nonwhite income in the South, something in the amount of $23 or $25 a week, he can see that a cumulative poll tax, which is the case in some of the States that have the poll tax, can take away a material part of a week's pay. This is not to say that it is a burden that is absolutely impossible, but it is a material drawback to the exercise of the privilege, and the Federal Government, through the Congress, has a right to act in this field, under the economic and other conditions we presently face in our country.

Madam President, if I may, I wish to summarize the argument I have made in favor of the statutory approach. I have not detained the Senate long, because this matter has been debated once before. I would like to summarize the situation as follows:

First and foremost, the path of a constitutional amendment, which has been around here for the last 14 years, has never been a path which the other body has followed. The other body has consistently, on five separate occasions, voted a statutory means for outlawing the poll tax. The only opportunity which the Senate has had to vote on it was in 1960, when the constitutional amendment which it passed came to naught in the other body. The Senate has on one previous occasion, in 1945, had a statutory provision reported by the Judiciary Committee.

If we adopt the constitutional amendment, we shall have to double back on our tracks and adopt a statute, because the amendment is not self-implementing. On the other hand, if we enact a statute, it immediately becomes operative and the poll tax is removed in the five States in which it remains.

Before I leave the constitutional amendment process, it has been stated there is some doubt—and I think there is some doubt—as to ratification when we have 11 States which did not ratify the amendment to give voting rights to citizens of the District of Columbia, and when we have 12 States which disqualify voters who are defined as paupers, with the possibility that certainly 2 of those States will prefer to leave the system as it is now instead of running the risk of what the amendment will or will not do in respect of paupers.

A brief word on the question of whether it is constitutional. I have before given the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, which I submit is entitled to be very seriously listened to by the Congress. I am referring to the opinion of the Attorney General as he testified on the question on March 15, 1962, before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. He said:

Let me turn now to House Joint Resolution 404 and other proposals to abolish State poll tax laws.

For the past quarter century, Congress and the Nation have been keenly aware of the unfair burden caused by such laws.

Federal legislation to eliminate them, either by statute or by constitutional amendment, has been introduced in every session since 1939. Anti-poll-tax bills were passed by the House five times. Similar proposals have been favorably reported by Senate comittees, and 2 years ago, one such measure passed the Senate.

I am completely in favor of these proposals. In the second half of the 20th century poll tax laws are out of date.

Only five States still have them—Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia.

Within recent years Florida, Tennessee, South Carolina, and Georgia, among others, have dropped these antiquated requirements. The State of Florida reports a notable increase in registration to vote since it abandoned the poll tax. So does Tennessee.

And so forth. Now I come to the question of constitutionality in the Attorney General's opinion. He said the following at page 9 of his statement:

How poll tax laws are to be eliminated is up to the Congress. I believe that Congress has the power under the Constitution to enact legislation abolishing State poll tax laws applied to Federal elections. I believe it has this power under sections 4 and 8 of article I of the Constitution, which I have already discussed; under section 4 of article IV, which gives the Federal Government a responsibility to guarantee a republican form of government to the States; and under the 14th and 15th amendments—

The basic reason for my belief is this: In America, the right to vote is the rule and restrictions on that right are the exception. The poll tax is an arbitrary and meaningless requirement, having no reasonable relationship to the rights and privileges of citizenship, and it may therefore be forbidden under the provisions I have mentioned.

Nevertheless, a constitutional amendment is a realistic and commendable path to the same goal. There should be little doubt of speedy ratification of such an amendment, since 45 of our 50 States already do not have such useless legislation.

I, therefore, endorse this method of eliminating poll taxes as a condition for voting in elections for Federal officers.

In short, the Attorney General found the statutory method perfectly constitutional. He also found the constitutional amendment route to be perfectly valid. In view of the fact that the administration's proposal was the amendment route, he adopted that. But it seems to me that the Congress unquestionably has the power to proceed by the statutory route, and the whole point of my argument today is that it ought to exercise that power.

Again by way of summing up, the power, in my opinion, is derived from the authority of the Congress to determine the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Federal office. It derives from the right of Congress to eliminate burdens upon or abridgments of the right to vote for Federal officials. It applies to the right of Congress also to deal under the 15th amendment, with situations which tend to create discrimination in voting, or under the 14th amendment with deprivations of the privileges and immunities of citizens.

On any one of those grounds, both on the factual basis which I have described, and on the basis of law which I have referred to, there is ample authority for Congress to proceed by the statutory method.

Finally, the provision that States shall have the authority over qualifications for voting is not a provision which defeats the power of the Congress in respect of the matter we are discussing now, because I point out that in the leading case on that point, the case which sustained a poll tax statute as constitutional on its face, Breedlove against Suttles, the court at no point referred to the poll tax as a qualification for voting, but spoke of it as a prerequisite. We respectfully submit that prerequisites for voting belong in the category of times, places, and manner of voting, which is within Congress power, rather than in the category of qualifications.

Now I would like to conclude my argument, if I may, upon the substantive aspects of this question, aside from its constitutionality, which I have discussed, and aside from the risks of getting a constitutional amendment ratified.

I might say to my colleagues that, of course, we should all try to do our utmost to get the amendment ratified if that is the choice of Congress, but, given the choice of means and the opportunity to eliminate the anchronism by statute—and it is an anchronism—I think we ought to take advantage of that opportunity.

I should like to call the attention of my colleagues to an editorial in the New York Times which I think properly epitomizes the choice which we face between a constitutional amendment and a simple statute.

The Times says, with respect to the poll tax amendment:

> Congress is taking the long way to a good end in its consideration of a constitutional amendment to outlaw the poll tax. This archaic system of restricting the right to vote survives in only five States, and fairness to both Negroes and whites requires its total discard with maximum speed. Its effectiveness in negating democracy is seen with special force in a State such as Mississippi, where the combination of poll taxes and literacy tests has been a factor in keeping three-quarters of the citizens from voting.
>
> The quickest way to get rid of this obstacle to true majority rule would be through a simple law prohibiting the States from making payment of a poll tax a requirement for voting in Federal elections. But the southern Democrats are not ready to move with such directness, and the administration has decided to settle for the much more cumbersome method of a constitutional amendment.
>
> Such an amendment cleared the Senate two years ago by a margin of nearly four to one, but never came to a vote in the House. This year it may again get lost in the endless jockeying that bedevils every effort to inch ahead on the civil rights front. President Kennedy's declaration of support for the measure should reduce this noxious possibility. Even after the proposal gets through Congress, it faces a wearying wait for ratification by the States. No sectional controversies were involved in the 22d amendment barring a third Presidential term. Yet it took almost 4 years from passage to effective date. A start on abolishing the poll tax is already long past due.

In short, in view of the tortuous experience which we have had with the constitutional amendment route, it seems clear to me that we should take the most direct statutory route, particularly in view of the fact that notwithstanding the administration's support for the constitutional amendment, the administration's representative, the Attorney General, who represents the administration on legal matters, nonetheless supports the proposition which I have stated, that it is perfectly constitutional to proceed by the statutory route.

Madam President, under these circumstances it seems to me we should not ourselves invite, without any assurance of success considering past history, the long and tortuous passage on which we shall be embarking if we adopt the constitutional amendment route. We should do something definitive. We have the opportunity to do something definitive. Let us do something definitive. Let us pass the statute. Ultimately we shall have to act by statute anyway. Let us act by statute now, especially in view of the very strong case which can be made for acting in that fashion.

It was said a long time ago by Salmon P. Chase, "The way to resumption is to resume." I say the same in respect to this problem. The way to outlaw this anachronistic poll tax is to outlaw it now, by statute in the Congress, especially since we have every encouragement from the fact that the other body, having passed such a provision five times, is far more likely to adopt a statutory provision than to adopt a constitutional amendment, which the Senate has passed once and which never got anywhere in the other body.

For those reasons, Madam President, I hope the Senate will support my substitute and the statutory approach toward solving this problem.

Mr. COOPER. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. As I understand the Senator's argument, he takes the position that either the statutory or the constitutional amendment is adequate to prohibit the imposition of a poll tax by the States.

Mr. JAVITS. I must say to my colleague that I would not wish to say precisely that—and I am sure my colleague knows my love and respect for him—because he used the word "adequate." If the Senator will allow me to say it my way, I would say that certainly the statutory or constitutional amendment approach, assuming enactment and implementation, would bring about an end to the poll tax.

I have argued, and I am deeply convinced, that the statutory approach is by all odds the better way to proceed.

Mr. COOPER. Madam President, will the Senator from New York yield further? I do not wish to intrude upon the time of the Senator from Illinois, but this may be the only opportunity I shall have to make a comment, because I understand that a motion is to be made to table the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I am led to intervene also, because of my great respect for the Senator from New York.

As the Senator knows quite well, I do not believe there have been many legislative issues upon which we have disagreed, particularly with respect to those issues which affect the field of civil rights. Whatever may be said about this issue, and how much it may be quieted down, this is an issue which is involved in the field of civil rights.

I intend to vote against the motion to table, when it is made, because I believe those who support the amendment of the Senator from New York, should have as reasonable an opportunity to support this amendment by argument and debate as those who have opposed the Holland amendment. I do not believe they would use up as much time.

But, because my position would not be known if the amendment is tabled, I state that if a vote comes upon the merits I will vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I do not believe that constitutionally the imposition of the poll tax by the States can be inhibited by the enactment of a legislative statute by the Congress.

We are in a dilemma. I believe the poll tax has been used in some States to discriminate against voters. I am very thankful we do not have such a tax in our State. But, I am sure, as the Senator from New York pointed out by reference to specific cases, the poll tax has been used in some States to discriminate against voters.

Nevertheless, the Congress of the United States can move against this discrimination only in a constitutional way. I believe that the only way the poll tax restrictions can be removed is under the terms of the Constitution, and that is by constitutional method.

The Senator from New York and I would agree upon this point, I am sure. We have been debating civil rights issues in the Senate for years, as well as proposed legislation. There is much that can be done if the effort would be made. During the last 2 years, we have played around the edges of the subject. A few legislative measures have been proposed of doubtful constitutionality.

I say that the record of the present administration has been one of avoiding legislative action. Little progress made in the field of civil rights, except in the continuation and extension of measures undertaken and initiated under the administration of President Eisenhower. No legislation has been passed. Emphasis seems to be laid upon the appointment of able and outstanding members of the Negro race to office. This is all for the good and I have favored these appointments, but appointment of a few to office is not a substitute for legislative action to more nearly assure equal rights to all Negroes and all people in this country.

In addition to appointment to offices, the administration has made much of the issue whether a Negro can belong to some club. I have no fault with this administration on either approach, but I assert they do not meet the needs, and the necessity of providing by legislation and Executive action equality of rights to all citizens.

I suggest there are some things the administration can do and the Congress can do, if there is really a desire to come to grips with the problem of civil rights. There are measures which can be taken without doubt of their constitutionality. Something can be done in the field of housing, by legislative action and probably by Executive action. If it does require legislative action, there is no question about its constitutionality.

In 1954 the Supreme Court ruled upon the Brown case. It has been 8 years since the ruling. If the administration wishes to make progress in this field it can have introduced in the Congress a legislative proposal to enable the Attorney General of the United States to intervene upon behalf of those who are discriminated against, under the Brown decision.

The Senator from New York and I have introduced proposed amendments to the Civil Rights Act of 1957 which would authorize the Attorney General to intervene, and give to him the same power with respect to integration of schools, as he has with respect to voting rights.

I have taken this opportunity to make the point that measures can be taken, both legislative and Executive, which will be effective in the field of civil rights, and which will not cut across the question of constitutionality. Those measures are not being taken by the administration or by the Congress.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida is a good amendment. I will vote for it. I am sorry in this instance I cannot join, as I often do, with my dear friend, a strong fighter for constitutional and civil rights, the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I am very grateful to my colleague. I wish to join with the Senator in what he has stated about the fact that we are playing around.

Madam President, I think we are not hitting the main point and that we are playing around. I do not say this for a moment in any sense of derogation of the efforts of our friend from Florida.

Mr. COOPER. I do not, either.

Mr. JAVITS. I think all of us understand his position and his sincerity on this question for many years. But in relation to the substance of what we are accomplishing, I say we are still playing around. The administration has asked for only two measures. They are by no means earth shattering civil rights measures. Both are with respect to voting, in which the path has been thoroughly blazed. At the same time the administration "sits on its hands" with reference to an order that would eliminate discrimination in housing. It does not ask the Congress to do anything about segregation in the school systems. It does not even give power to the Attorney General to start suits in relation to those questions. I could not agree with the Senator from Kentucky more, and while he and I differ as to the constitutionality of this particular approach which I am urging, nonetheless, be it said, so far as I am concerned, I am offering it to the Senate, working for it here in the Senate, and debating it today because I do not want us to play around. If we really want to get to ultimates, let us at least do something which will be tangible and effective, instead of merely giving people power to do something about something later when they start a suit or when they ratify a constitutional amendment. If we should today pass the statutory approach which I have proposed, the House passes it, and the President signs it—as he will, because the Attorney General has said that the measure is constitutional—then we would have done something. We would have outlawed the poll tax, and that would be the end of it in the five States. We would have stopped playing around.

I wish the Senator from Kentucky—and I know completely the purity of his judgment and the sincerity of his views—had come to the other conclusion and that he could have joined with me today in trying to do something which would have stopped the playing around even in the very limited area in which the administration is allowing us to operate today.

Let it never be forgotten that we cannot get a civil rights measure of any kind passed unless the administration in authority asks for it. This was true with the Eisenhower administration; it is true with the Kennedy administration. I take a very dim view of the prospects, notwithstanding the great fights which will be put up by my colleague Senator KEATING on the subject of voting, by myself on the subject of education, and by others to whom were assigned various aspects of the new civil rights package which was introduced on March 13. Notwithstanding everything we do, it will take the administration to do more. We understand that. Hence my effort today at least to make what the administration is asking for, limited as it is, meaningful by making the measure a statute which could accomplish something, instead of a constitutional amendment which would go to the other body, where it has never succeeded before, then make the rounds of the States, and then come back for us to pass some kind of implementing statute. I say let us do it now.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am sorry I have not heard all the able argument of the distinguished Senator. I wonder how he has dealt with the question of choice of electors to vote for President and Vice President. I notice that even the distinguished Attorney General, who testified on this question, testified that it presented very great trouble to him, and that it appeared to be one of the principal reasons why he preferred the amendment approach. As a basis for the Senator's comment, may I read or reread, for the Senator has read it already, the provisions in the Constitution on this point? The first provision to which I refer is in section 1 of article II, the second paragraph of which reads as follows:

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

Besides that provision, the only other provision on the choice of electors of which the Senator from Florida knows is that contained in paragraph 3 of the same article, which he reads as follows:

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

The Senator from Florida has not been able to figure out any means whereby any mind, no matter how capable in the field of law, could justify interference with those provisions through a statute, and he wonders why the Senator from New York has come to the conclusion that his proposed statute would be legal as applied to this particular field of the selection of electors to choose the President and the Vice President of the United States.

Mr. JAVITS. What my statutory approach and what the statutory approach adopted time and again in the House seeks to reach is the voter himself. If, therefore, the voter is to vote for electors, then his right to vote shall not be inhibited or encumbered by a poll tax. In short, if he does vote, the poll tax shall not represent a prerequisite to voting. It seems to me that that scheme is entirely consistent with every phase of the Constitution. Whatever function the voter performs, he shall perform it free of any requirement for a poll tax. That is the point of my statutory approach, and I think it is the point of the Senator's proposed constitutional amendment. I do not see where we would run afoul of any difficulty in respect of other matters in the Constitution so long as we limit whatever we do with respect to the particular voter and his ability to vote when he is called upon to do so.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I refer the Senator again to the words—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors,

How does the Senator get away from the point that that provision, together with the later provision which I have already read, prescribes the whole of any Federal approach to the question of the naming of electors?

Mr. JAVITS. The fact is that when a voter votes for electors in a State, that being the method which the legislature has chosen for the designation as electors, a voter shall not be subject to the requirement of a poll tax. I do not see where there is any inconsistency in the scheme of control when we deal solely with what shall enable the voter to vote or what shall prevent him from voting. I do not see that that would in any way cross over or negate any of the provisions of the Constitution with respect to electors which the Senator has read.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I call to the Senator's attention a statement of Mr. Katzenbach, the very able Assistant Attorney General, appearing on page 368, part 2 of the hearings before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments. I shall read only one sentence:

> However, whether Congress may enact laws to abolish the poll tax as a condition for election of presidential electors presents a more difficult question.

The learned Assistant Attorney General differentiated between the two cases, that is, the selection of presidential electors and the selection of Senators and Representatives.

The Senator from Florida thinks that the constitutional provisions with reference to the election of Senators and Representatives are perfectly strong and clear and that they make the question a constitutional one, as has already been stated by his good friend from Kentucky. But it seems to the Senator from Florida that the learned Assistant Attorney General who was testifying very properly called attention to the fact that on the question of the selection of electors for President and Vice President even a more difficult situation was presented. I wondered how the distinguished Senator from New York got around that point.

Mr. JAVITS. I just made my reply to that question. Will the Senator be good enough to key us again to the hearings to which he referred?

Mr. HOLLAND. I referred to the second volume of the hearings.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to read it into the RECORD so we all know what we are talking about. It is the second volume of the hearings before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate held June 27, 28, and 29, 1961.

In that regard I should like to point out the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Katzenbach's superior, as recently as March 13, 1962, in which he said:

> I believe Congress has the power under the Constitution to enact legislation abolishing State poll tax laws applied to Federal elections.

I hold with the Attorney General. I have defined my reason for that conclusion in terms of the law as being an effort by my substitute for the Senator's constitutional amendment to reach the voter when, as and if the voter is exercising his privilege of voting. At that point I say he shall not be in any way subject to the requirements of a tax, to wit, the poll tax.

Mr. HOLLAND. The question as to which is the superior as between the Attorney General and the learned Assistant Attorney General might be the subject of some argument in debate, but I will not debate that with the former attorney general of the State of New York, who may be prejudiced in favor of attorneys general. I merely wished to comment that the Assistant Attorney General had made a very scholarly statement on this subject, as is shown by his testimony, and that he very carefully delineated the difference between the election of Senators and Representatives, on which I personally believe the Constitution is completely clear, and stated that it was a still more difficult question to see how a State could be deprived of setting up machinery "in the manner" that the legislature might determine for the election of its own electors.

Surely the Senator recognizes the fact that here is a new question, a different question, and, the Senator from Florida thinks, a much more difficult question.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not quote the authority of the Attorney General as being supreme and conclusive and superior in legal judgment to that of Mr. Katzenbach. I was only giving the facts about the hierarchy of authority. I rather rely upon my own opinion that what I seek to do by statute is unaffected by this provision of the Constitution as it relates to the voter if, as, and when he is a voter in respect of elections for officials under the Federal Constitution. All that the Senator has read demonstrates that this elector is an official contemplated by the Federal Constitution. When, as, and if a voter is to vote for the elector, I do not wish that voter—and that is all I have tried to do by this statutory approach—to be subject to any taxes.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend from New York. I am sorry that we are not of the same opinion. As I understand it, he is for his amendment, but he is also for my amendment if his amendment fails. In any event I am glad to have his support even on that kind of condition.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator from Florida is very gracious. Let us leave it that I am for doing something, and that if we want to do something we should adopt my amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Madam President, I rise to support the proposal, in the nature of a substitute to Senator HOLLAND's amendment, which has been offered by the Senator from New York, and which is sponsored by a group of bipartisan Senators on both sides of the aisle. Just as the opposition to effective civil rights legislation has been bipartisan in nature, I have always felt that the advocacy of civil rights should also be bipartisan in nature. We were very happy, therefore, when the Senator from New York, with his great ability, was willing to lead the fight for the method of statutory enactment rather than constitutional amendment for the abolition of poll tax.

I cannot however agree with the Senator from New York, who is my very dear friend, in the caustic criticism which he has made about the conduct of the Kennedy administration. When all the difficulties are considered, I believe the Kennedy administration has made great progress in the field of civil rights, as was recognized in the statement recently issued by the Southern Regional Conference. However, I am always happy to join with the Senator from New York in this struggle for civil rights. He is a host in himself. I am also always happy to have colleagues on the other side of the aisle who will join with us. I only hope that in the vote, which is coming shortly, he will be able to muster as many votes on his side of the aisle as we may be able to muster on our side, and that we may have, therefore, a rivalry in well doing. Let the rollcall show where the balance of merit may lie.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. It is always an occasion when we have a debate of this character to speak about bipartisan cooperation, which in all the 6 years that I have been in the Senate has been probably the most gratifying personal experience that I have had. It is a unique instrument which has been forged here in this civil rights struggle. I wish we had more troops. But we certainly have no need to doubt the loyalty or zeal of those we do have.

The Senator from Illinois came to this cause long before I did—not that I had not wanted to, but I was not in the legislature and in the seat of authority to do so. The Senator from Illinois is rightly considered—and if not, I shall make that nomination—the very dean and inspiration of the bipartisan civil rights struggle in this country. This struggle will ultimately succeed. We, at least, whatever may be our successes or failures of the interim, have the gratification of knowing that what we struggle for is not only morally right and essential for the future of our country, but also must succeed because our country's well being will tolerate no other resolution of these controversies and debates.

If the Senator from Illinois will have no other place in history—and he deserves one for his economic work and many other efforts in which he has engaged—his place in history is absolutely secure in this field by the acclamation of not only the people who are affected and by the American people, but, I would like to add, by the acclamation of those colleagues in the Senate with whom he has worked so closely in these things, including myself.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Madam President, I thank the Senator from New York for his gracious comments, of which I am undeserving. The Senator from New York is a most cooperative and able colleague. It has been a great pleasure to work with him. I am not interested in staking out any claim in this field for myself. I do now even wish to stake out a claim for the zeal with which the northern and western members of the Democratic Party have fought for civil rights. I hope that the very able Senator from New York will be able to muster as large a proportion of his colleagues in this cause as I hope we will be able to muster on our side.

I. THE LEGISLATIVE QUESTION BEFORE THE SENATE

Madam President, it is not my purpose, as a layman, to enter into any long discussion of the constitutionality of Federal statutes outlawing poll taxes or discriminatory literacy tests. Suffice it to say that the able argument of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the statement by the Attorney General have personally convinced me that such a law could be constitutional. At the very least it can be said that there are very strong grounds upon which the Supreme Court could declare such statutes constitutional, and that the members of the Court could do this without inflicting the slightest scar upon their judicial consciences.

I am ready to leave the question of the constitutionality of such a statute to the Justices of the Supreme Court and, I believe, we of the legislative branch should instead center our efforts upon the legislative questions as to whether, first, it is good public policy for us to try to abolish the poll tax, and if so; second, what is the most effective method of accomplishing it?

I know it is always a temptation for legislators to discourse at length on the constitutionality of bills which are under consideration, but I suggest that these constitutional discussions are primarily influenced by the political and economic interests and emotional feelings of the participants. This, at least, has been the prevailing practice in the long history of social legislation.

We will recall now when the Wagner Act was proposed, many solons in this body declared pontifically that it was clearly an unconstitutional use of the commerce clause. The Supreme Court held otherwise.

When unemployment compensation and old-age security were up for action, it was argued that this was an obvious misuse of the taxing and spending powers of Congress. The Supreme Court held otherwise. When the Fair Labor Standards Act was introduced it was vehemently contended that this was a manifest misuse of the commerce clause as well as a violation of the fifth amendment which prohibits the Federal Government from taking property without due process of law. The Supreme Court held otherwise.

This experience should teach us all to be chary about pronouncing on the constitutionality of outlawing the poll tax by statutory enactment. We may more appropriately center our attention upon the proper ends to be sought and the best means to be employed.

This morning, at an early hour, I was reading some Gilbert and Sullivan. I came to a verse in "Iolanthe" in which W. S. Gilbert wrote about the House of Lords. In the early part of the 19th century, the House of Lords was the supreme legislative body in England. It regarded itself as the greatest deliberative body in the world, a description which is now frequently applied by Senators to the Senate of the United States. Mr. W. S. Gilbert expressed his opinion of this claim in some verses which I think are still amusing and still appropriate:

And while the House of Peers withholds its legislative hand,
And noble statesmen do not itch
To interfere with matters which they do not understand,
As bright will shine Great Britain's rays
As in King George's glorious days.

II. POLL TAX UNSUPPORTED BY POLITICAL THEORY OF DEMOCRACY

Despite the recent speeches by certain Senators, not many will now openly defend the imposition of a poll tax as a requirement for voting. It was put into general effect in the South not immediately after the Civil War, not immediately after 1877, when the Federal troops were withdrawn, but between 1895 and 1910 for very specific reasons which I shall later discuss. The philosophic argument for it rests upon much the same ground as property requirements for voting; namely, that people without property or who are not able to afford the payment of a poll tax, either have no vital interests which the Government should protect or are so unqualified to vote that they cannot properly use the franchise. Traces of these arguments were contained in the first speech on this subject by the erudite junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

But if the history of the United States and of modern democracies teaches anything it is that while the proper protection of property is a function of government, it is not the only one. Governments should also protect the lives and liberties of its citizens, and in the Declaration of Independence, the founders of our Republic boldly declared that one of three basic rights of the individual which governments were instituted to secure was no less than "the pursuit of happiness." This was next reaffirmed by the Articles of Confederation which declared that one of the purposes of the new confederation was to aid in the general welfare.

The Constitution itself in 1787 not only declared that one of the six main purposes for the new Republic was to "promote the general welfare," but also in article I, section 8, prescribed that Congress might use its taxing and spending powers not merely for "the common defense" but also for the "general welfare."

Lincoln well summed up this principle at Gettysburg when he said that ours was a Government for the people as well as of the people. But it was and is something more. It is also a Government by the people. Not only did Lincoln so state, but the very preamble of the Declaration of Independence lays down as a fundamental axiom that Governments "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The people therefore were ultimately to control, and while this was originally strained through independent intermediate bodies in the choice of the President and the Senate, these barriers have now been eliminated. Property qualifications originally imposed by the States have also been repealed and the continuation of the poll tax is an anachronism which cannot be defended in a modern democracy. People have the right to protect their dignity and welfare as well as their property. Participation in public affairs makes them more informed and better rounded citizens.

III. POLITICAL REALITIES BEHIND ADOPTION OF THE POLL TAX

So much for political theory. But the political realities which caused the poll tax to be accepted in the South were of a direct and practical nature.

Here I shall rely upon the testimony of the most eminent historian of recent southern politics in the person of C. Vann Woodward, who has told the story in great detail in his books "Origins of the New South," and "The Strange Case of Jim Crow." First, however, let me qualify Mr. Woodward as a sympathetic authority on the South and defend him against the inevitable charge that he is either a northerner or a Yankee sympathizer.

I have looked up Mr. Woodward's record and checked it. It shows that Professor Woodward was born in Arkansas and took his degree at Emory University in Georgia. He did his graduate work at the University of North Carolina. He taught at Georgia Tech, then at the University of Florida, and following that at the University of Virginia. He has taught in Tennessee and Texas, and indeed, throughout the South, and he is now Professor of American History at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, which is at least half a southern city. I want to be strictly accurate in what I say, and I must admit that he did lecture for a year at Oxford. But I do not consider this to be a disqualification but in fact the opposite.

In fact, some of my best friends have been Oxford men. I submit, therefore, that Mr. Woodward is southern born, raised and educated, and almost his entire life has been spent in the South. If his credentials should be further questioned, let it be recorded that one of his grandfathers fought in the Confederate Army for 4 years, and it is my impression that he was wounded defending the Stars and Bars. Certainly, as a good southern soldier, he showed his patriotism by trying to kill as many northerners as he could.

In view of all this, I think it must be admitted that Mr. Woodward comes to us with an impeccable record from the southern point of view.

And now, what does this patriotic and learned son of the South tell us about the importance of the poll tax? He points out that the rise of the Farmers Alliance in the South in 1892 and particularly in 1894 frightened the dominant economic and political groups of that region.

These States had been run from 1877 on—that was the year when Hayes withdrew the Federal troops—by the planter aristocracy, the big merchants, the bankers, the manufacturers, and the railroads. We sometimes think of the Farmers' Alliance, or, as it became known in the West, the populist movement, as purely a western movement; but it was probably stronger in the South than it was in the West. The Farmers' Alliance sought, on the State level, more popular education, a reform of the tax structure, control over railroad rates, and many other features. Nationally, the Populist Party which became its predominant political arm advocated a Federal income tax, the direct primary and direct election of Senators, the nationalization of the railways, a Federal credit system, and other features thought at the time to be radical.

The alliance also had a parallel Negro organization which at one time claimed almost a million members. This parallel Negro organization was kept separate for social purposes but cooperated closely in political and economic efforts. It worked with much the same objectives, and there was a general attempt on its part to unite the poor whites and Negroes upon a common program of economic and political reform.

The Populist movement functioned as a separate party in a number of Southern States; such as, Georgia, North Carolina, Alabama, Louisiana, and Texas, and, under the leadership of Ben Tillman, inside the Democratic Party in South Carolina. In 1894, the Populists sometimes in fusion with the Republicans, polled an extraordinarily high percentage of the vote in most of the Southern States.

Percentages of votes for Populist and Fusion State tickets in 1894

| State: | Percent |
|---|---|
| Virginia | 27 |
| North Carolina | 54 |
| Georgia | 44 |
| Florida | 21 |
| Alabama | 48 |
| Mississippi | 27 |
| Louisiana (1896) | 44 |
| Texas | 36 |

It will be seen that the Populist movement and the Republicans carried North Carolina.

At that time the Georgia movement was led by Tom Watson, who worked very closely with the Negroes.

Alabama gave 48 percent of its votes for the Populist and Fusion State tickets. They nearly captured Alabama.

This extraordinary showing frightened the dominant political and economic groups in the South, and they moved swiftly to defeat it.

One of the two major devices which they used was to impose literacy tests together with property and poll taxes. Mississippi had instituted this system earlier, in 1890, probably as a reaction to the Lodge bill. Other States began to follow suit, such as South Carolina in 1895, Louisiana in 1898, North Carolina in 1900, Alabama in 1901, Virginia in 1902, in the celebrated Virginia constitutional convention; Georgia in 1908, and Oklahoma in 1910.

Other States which adopted the poll tax were Florida, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Texas. In a relatively short time the whole South was covered with poll tax provisions, as well as with a web of other provisions.

Professor Woodward's comments on this device are penetrating:

> With its cumulative features and procedures artfully devised to discourage payment, the poll tax was esteemed, at first by some of its proponents as the most reliable means of curtailing the franchise not only among the Negroes but among objectionable whites as well (Woodward, "The Strange Case of Jim Crow," p. 67).

The second major device was to split the poor whites apart from the Negroes so that a political alliance between them would be impossible. This led to the passage of segregation laws and ordinances—with which we are dealing today—which, as Woodward shows, are of a far more recent date than is commonly believed. Racism was therefore substituted for populism, as an emotional driving force for the poor whites. It was a tragedy that many of the popular leaders in the South accepted this substitute and pursued it vigorously. Ben Tillman, of South Carolina, may have been the most conspicuous; but Heflin, of Alabama; Vardaman, of Mississippi; and Jeff Davis, of Arkansas, were not far behind. Tom Watson, of Georgia—who early had been a most eloquent advocate of economic and other cooperation between the races—held out against racism longer than most; but he finally succumbed, and finally rode to political power upon the doctrine of white supremacy in its most virulent form, embracing both anti-Negroism and anti-semitism.

The basic purpose of the poll tax was, therefore, not to raise revenue, as has been alleged, and as the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has suggested. It was designed, instead, to limit the franchise. It was intended to reduce the number of low-income citizens who could vote. It disenfranchised poor whites as well as poor Negroes. But since the Negroes were on the average much poorer than the whites, it disenfranchised more Negroes than whites.

It was one of the devices used by the economic and political aristocracy of the South to keep the rest of the South in subjugation.

A web of other restrictions, such as property, literacy, ability to pass so-called citizenship tests, the "white primary" and so forth, was also woven and still further restricted Negro suffrage; but it was made somewhat easier for the whites to penetrate these measures.

The poll tax and its allied restrictions had the planned-for effect. Woodward states:

> In the seventies, eighties, and nineties, the Negroes voted in large numbers. White leaders of opposing parties encouraged them to vote and earnestly solicited their votes. Qualified and acknowledged leaders of southern white opinion were on record as saying that it was proper, inevitable and desirable that they should vote. Yet after the disenfranchisement measures were passed around 1900, the Negroes ceased to vote. And at that time, qualified and acknowledged leaders of white opinion said, "It was unthinkable that they should ever be permitted to vote" (Woodward, "The Strange Case of Jim Crow," p. 91).

Thus in Louisiana there were 130,300 Negroes registered in 1897, but only 5,300 in 1900, and 1,340 in 1904, or a decrease of approximately 129,000. The number of whites who were registered was also reduced by 72,000—from 164,000 to 92,000—Woodward, "Origins of the New South," pages 342–343.

Following these measures of disenfranchisement, the percentage of voters who went to the polls decreased sharply. In Virginia, between 1892 and 1902, the vote for Congressmen fell off by 56 percent; in Alabama, the decrease was 60 percent; in Mississippi, 69 percent; in Louisiana, 80 percent, and in North Carolina, 34 percent. Florida showed a decrease of 69 percent; Arkansas, of 75 percent; Tennessee, of 50 percent; and Georgia, of 80 percent—Woodward, in the work cited page 345.

The net effect of all these restrictive provisions, of which the poll tax was only one, was therefore to disenfranchise a large percentage of the voters, both black and white, but of course primarily black, for—as I have said—there were always escape hatches, under the literacy and property tests, through which the whites could be allowed to pass.

But these restrictions, combined with the white primary and the one-party system, operated to reduce the percentage of those voting in the Southern States to the lowest levels in the country. Senators and Representatives from the South came to be elected by relatively small constituencies.

IV. POLL TAX STILL A VEHICLE OF DISENFRANCHISEMENT

In the 1930's and 1940's strong movements developed throughout the country to abolish the poll tax. National action was proposed and defeated, but some State action followed. A good deal of the State action was in response to this and was an attempt to head off further Northern efforts to outlaw the poll tax, by national legislation. North Carolina had already led the way in 1920. Huey Long was instrumental in getting the poll tax repealed in Louisiana in 1934; and I have often felt that the memory of Huey Long has perhaps been somewhat unjustly attacked, for a large part of his program was an attempt to restore power to people who had been stripped of that power by the restrictive legislation of some 35 years before.

Florida followed, in 1937, in repealing the poll tax, as the Senator from Florida has said. Georgia, under Ellis Arnall, abolished the tax in 1945; and then the movement halted for a few years. But in the early 1950's, after further national efforts had failed, South Carolina and Tennessee joined their sister States. But Virginia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Texas stood fast. In three of these States—Virginia, Arkansas and Texas—proposals to abolish the poll tax have been defeated; and those who now enjoy the presently limited franchise seem to be reluctant to broaden it so to admit others. I think it is recognized that the chances for repeal in the other two States—Alabama and Mississippi—are slight.

But, Madam President, this is not a small matter, because in 1960 these 5 States had a total population of 21 million, or approximately 12 percent of the population of the United States.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table which I have prepared, which shows the present poll tax provisions of these States.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE 6

| State | Amount of poll tax per year | Is tax cumulative and if so for how long (yes or no) | Maximum State charge | How long before election must poll tax be paid | Is receipt required to prove eligibility at election |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | | | Months | |
| Arkansas | $1 | No | $1.00 | ? | Yes. |
| Alabama | $1.50 | Yes (2 years preceding election year). | 3.00 | 9 | No. |
| Mississippi | $2 plus $1 | Yes (2 years preceding election year). | 4.00 | 9 | Yes. |
| Texas | $1.50 | No | 1.50 | 9 | Yes. |
| Virginia | $1.50 | Yes (3 years preceding election year). | 4.50 | 6 | No.[1] |

[1] In Virginia, receipt is only required to prove that voter moving from another county has paid poll tax there during the 3 preceding years.

Source: Mollie Z. Margolin. "Qualification of Voting," summary of State laws, etc., Library of Congress, Legislative Reference Service, June 1961, 229 pages. Ogden, "Poll Tax in the South."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Madam President, defenders of the poll tax commonly lay great stress upon the relative smallness of the tax, as an argument that its payment is not a deterrent to voting. It is pointed out that the poll tax in Arkansas is $1; that in Alabama, Texas, and Virginia, it is $1.50; and that in Mississippi it is $2, plus another dollar. There is no one so poor, it is contended, that he cannot afford to pay from $1 to $2 for the privilege of voting. And if one does not pay it, the failure to do so is said to be proof that the citizen is indifferent to this privilege, and hence does not deserve to be accorded it.

It is no doubt true that the rise in the real incomes of southern people during the last 25 years has made the mere size of the poll tax less onerous than it was; we of the North are very happy that there has been that increase. The Democratic Members of Congress from the North and from the West have consistently voted for measures which would develop the economy of the South. We should realize, however, that between 20 and 25 percent of the population of the country is still on a poverty level of existence, and can be accurately described as "ill fed, ill housed, and ill clothed." The percentage in this class is, of course, appreciably greater in the South than for the Nation as a whole.

When some 25 years ago, President Franklin D. Roosevelt in his inaugural address referred to "one-third of the Nation" as "ill clothed, ill housed, and ill fed," apparently that was a somewhat inaccurate statement, because the actual figures show that at that time approximately three-eighths of the people of the Nation were in that condition. Of course since that time improvements have been made; but the percentage in the South is still appreciably greater than that in the North.

In this connection let me point out that the title of Mr. Galbraith's book, "The Affluent Society," is in many respects perhaps an unfortunate one, for our society is not wholly an affluent one, and there are deep and wide pockets of great poverty and misery. Even the payment of a dollar or two is a heavy burden for an adult to bear in such a family, particularly when the benefits are at best intangible, and doubtless seem to many to be illusory.

The poll tax deterrent is moreover compounded in the three States where the requirement is cumulative. In Alabama and Mississippi the tax must be paid for the 2 years prior to the year of election, and hence comes to a total of $3 and $4, respectively.

I may say that until recently Alabama had a cumulative provision of 24 years, which meant that before one went on the rolls, he had to pay $36 before he could qualify. To the credit of Alabama, the 24-year cumulative provision has been abolished, but, even so, one must pay the tax for 2 years prior to the election.

In Virginia, the cumulative requirement is 3 years and the total is $4.50. Since a very large proportion of the citizens have not paid their poll tax, and are at present disqualified, they must therefore make a very sizable initial payment to acquire eligibility. The cumulative requirement is therefore a further substantial deterrent.

Added to this is the fact that in three of the States—Alabama, Mississippi, and Texas—the poll tax must be paid 9 months, and in Virginia 6 months, before the election. It is difficult for the average citizen to remember that the payment is required that far in advance, and since there is very little publicity on this point, a citizen must be very alert indeed to be able to qualify. The right to vote should not be made as difficult as that. It, of course, operates most severely against the poor, the less educated, and those most severely buffeted by the immediate problems of life. But the more absentminded also miss out.

A final hurdle is set up in the three States which require the prospective voter to bring his poll tax receipt with him before he can vote. This is not only true in Texas and Arkansas, where no other registration is required, but also in Mississippi, where it is. It is very easy, therefore, for people who have paid the poll tax to forget that they must keep on their person the physical proof of this payment when they go to vote. This is particularly true because of the fact that this requirement tends to be obscured and not emphasized, so that it is very natural for the prospective voter to lose or mislay his receipt.

All these plus other restrictions, together with the absence of an effective two-party system, cause the 11 Southern States to be at the bottom of the list in the proportion of those of voting age who vote in general elections.

I ask unanimous consent that a table covering the percentage of civilian population of voting age who voted in the presidential election of 1960 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1960 election score board—How the States ranked in percentage of civilians of voting age who voted in the 1960 presidential election

| Rank | State | Civilian population of voting age | Total vote | Percentage |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | Idaho | 372,000 | 300,451 | 80.766 |
| 2 | New Hampshire | 367,000 | 295,761 | 80.588 |
| 3 | Utah | 469,000 | 374,981 | 79.953 |
| 4 | North Dakota | 350,000 | 278,431 | 79.551 |
| 5 | South Dakota | 388,000 | 306,087 | 78.831 |
| 6 | West Virginia | 1,085,000 | 837,781 | 77.214 |
| 7 | Minnesota | 2,003,000 | 1,541,887 | 76.978 |
| 8 | Connecticut | 1,590,000 | 1,222,883 | 76.910 |
| 9 | Indiana | 2,784,000 | 2,135,360 | 76.701 |
| 10 | Massachusetts | 3,230,000 | 2,469,480 | 76.454 |
| 11 | Iowa | 1,669,000 | 1,273,820 | 76.321 |
| 12 | Illinois | 6,244,000 | 4,757,394 | 76.191 |
| 13 | Rhode Island | 533,000 | 405,534 | 76.085 |
| 14 | Wyoming | 186,000 | 140,892 | 75.748 |
| 15 | Delaware | 264,000 | 196,683 | 74.501 |
| 16 | Maine | 574,000 | 421,767 | 73.478 |
| 17 | Michigan | 4,519,000 | 3,318,097 | 73.425 |
| 18 | Alaska | 83,000 | 60,762 | 73.207 |
| 19 | Colorado | 1,007,000 | 736,246 | 73.112 |
| 20 | Missouri | 2,651,000 | 1,934,422 | 72.969 |
| 21 | Washington | 1,703,000 | 1,241,572 | 72.905 |
| 22 | Wisconsin | 2,373,000 | 1,729,082 | 72.864 |
| 23 | Vermont | 230,000 | 167,324 | 72.749 |
| 24 | New Jersey | 3,827,000 | 2,773,111 | 72.461 |
| 25 | Montana | 387,000 | 277,579 | 71.725 |
| 26 | Nebraska | 857,000 | 613,095 | 71.539 |
| 27 | Ohio | 5,833,000 | 4,161,859 | 71.349 |
| 28 | Oregon | 1,089,000 | 775,462 | 71.208 |
| 29 | Kansas | 1,315,000 | 928,825 | 70.633 |
| 30 | California | 9,219,000 | 6,507,082 | 70.583 |
| 31 | Pennsylvania | 7,102,000 | 5,006,541 | 70.494 |
| 32 | New York | 10,788,000 | 7,291,079 | 67.584 |
| 33 | Oklahoma | 1,399,000 | 903,150 | 64.556 |
| 34 | New Mexico | 491,000 | 311,118 | 63.364 |
| 35 | Nevada | 174,000 | 107,267 | 61.647 |
| 36 | Kentucky | 1,876,000 | 1,124,462 | 59.939 |
| 37 | Arizona | 680,000 | 398,491 | 58.601 |
| 38 | Maryland | 1,819,000 | 1,055,349 | 58.017 |
| 39 | Hawaii | 321,000 | 184,745 | 57.552 |
| 40 | North Carolina | 2,521,000 | 1,368,966 | 54.302 |
| 41 | Tennessee | 2,079,000 | 1,051,792 | 50.591 |
| 42 | Florida | 3,099,000 | 1,544,180 | 49.828 |
| 43 | Louisiana | 1,770,000 | 807,891 | 45.604 |
| 44 | Texas | 5,329,000 | 2,311,670 | 43.379 |
| 45 | Arkansas | 1,029,000 | 428,509 | 41.643 |
| 46 | Virginia | 2,244,000 | 771,449 | 34.378 |
| 47 | South Carolina | 1,227,000 | 386,687 | 31.514 |
| 48 | Georgia | 2,342,000 | 733,349 | 31.312 |
| 49 | Alabama | 1,825,000 | 564,242 | 30.917 |
| 50 | Mississippi | 1,163,000 | 298,171 | 25.638 |

Sources: The American Heritage Foundation; State Election Officials; United States Census Bureau. Hearings before Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendment of Committee on the Judiciary, June 27, 28, and 29, 1961, pt. 2, p. 475.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As the Senator from Florida mentioned earlier, these figures show that the average for the country is a little over 70 percent. Idaho had the best record, with almost 81 percent voting. New Hampshire was next with over 80 percent. I am very happy that my own State was in the upper quarter. Illinois had 76 percent who voted and occupied 12th place despite the large proportion of our foreign-born population who are not yet citizens. But the 11 States at the bottom are all Southern States.

Thus, as the Senator from Florida mentioned, Alabama and Mississippi are at the very bottom, a little less than 26 percent for Mississippi, and 31 percent for Alabama.

While the percentages of participating voters is still low in all of the six non-poll-tax Southern States, they are higher than in the poll-tax States. But they are still very much below those of the Northern, Middle Western, and Western States.

It is certain that the mere removal of the tax will not work wonders overnight, or perhaps even in the immediate future. It will merely remove one of the strands in the web of the poll-tax States which now hold down the voting. But the evidence seems to indicate that it would appreciably increase the number of men and women who would go to the polls.

This can be shown by what happened to the rate of participation in a number of States after the repeal of the poll tax.

In Louisiana, the average rate of participation in the gubernatorial primaries increased from 40.2 percent to 61.1 percent after repeal. In the senatorial primaries, the increase in the average rate was from 31.2 to 46.5 percent.

In Florida the increase in the gubernatorial primaries was from 27 to 34.8 percent, and in the senatorial primaries from 20.1 to 32 percent.

In Georgia the repeal in 1945 of its cumulative poll tax resulted in a doubling of the number of voters, but this must be attributed in part to the collapse of the white primary and the introduction of the 18-year voting age. The average rate of turnout in Georgia gubernatorial primaries went from 16.9 to 30.3 percent.

In Tennessee, there was an average 12-percent increase after repeal.

Alabama's reduction of its cumulative poll-tax requirement, which, as I have said previously, amounted to 24 years, resulted in a spectacular increase of one-third in the number of registered voters and a long-term 10-percent increase in voting in senatorial and gubernatorial primaries.

Frederick D. Ogden, a southern political scientist, concludes that the repeal of the poll tax in general aided the movement for greater voting participation which was already underway. The increase which the abolishment of the poll tax would effect would be, according to him, somewhere between 5 and 10 percent. In my judgment, it might be higher. Certainly it would create several hundreds of thousands of additional voters. It might indeed cause many hundreds of thousands of additional voters to be added to the list.

V. POLL TAX SHOULD BE ABOLISHED BY STATUTE RATHER THAN BY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

The question is, then, What is the most effective way of removing this impediment?

I submit that the method of statutory enactment, once it were passed, would be far more effective than that of the proposed constitutional amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. In the first place, it would go into effect immediately across the Nation. The method of constitutional amendment is, on the other hand, at best slow and clumsy, while there is always the strong possibility or probability that it would never be ratified at all.

Let us consider the delay which a constitutional amendment would bring about. Thus, the 16th amendment took 3½ years to be ratified by the States after it was submitted to them by Congress.

The 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th amendments each required only approximately a year, while final ratification of the 21st amendment took less than a year, but ratification of the 22d amendment required 4 years.

Moreover, since the Holland amendment merely gives Congress the enabling power to pass a statute later, a further delay would necessarily occur after ratification. Indeed, unless the rules and procedures of the Senate are changed, a further filibuster might prevent such legislation from ever being passed.

It is, however, highly questionable whether the amendment would ever be ratified by the States, for, as we all know, three-quarters of the States must approve an amendment before it can become a part of the Constitution. Therefore, if only 13 of the 50 States were to refuse or neglect to ratify such an amendment, it would not go into effect, no matter how small might be the population of those States or how restricted the numbers who actually took part in the electoral process.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I note that the Senator has not referred to the District of Columbia voting amendment, which, as I recall, was ratified in about 9 months.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. That involved somewhat the same issue as would be involved in this proposed amendment. I do not know why the Senator omitted reference to that particular amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That was an omission. I am very glad to correct it.

It is, of course, a certainty that the five States which now impose a poll tax, and whose presently eligible voters have refused to repeal it, would not vote to give to the Government in Washington the power to do that which they will not do for themselves. What, then, about the other six States of the Old South which do not have the poll-tax requirement? We can be quite certain that powerful and moving appeals will be directed at them in the name of their common past and their present sectional groupings. They will be asked if they are willing to allow the northerners and westerners in Washington, D.C., to dictate to their sister States what they should do. "You may not believe in the poll tax," they will be told, "but please do not put us under the alien hand of the Yankees in Washington. Let us determine for ourselves what standards are to be followed inside our own States."

This will be reinforced by invocations to the mystical pathos of the lost cause. The voters of the six sister States will be reminded that their grandfathers fought together at Gettysburg and Lookout Mountain and shed their blood together for the Stars and Bars.

The memory of Robert E. Lee, Jefferson Davis, Stonewall Jackson, and their lieutenants will be invoked once more. Once again traveler will make the sad journey back from Appomattox, and the tired and footsore soldier in the faded gray uniform will again return to find his home burned, his cattle killed, and his silver stolen.

It will be almost impossible to resist such powerful emotional appeals as these, and it is doubtful whether a single one of the six remaining States of the Old South will have the temerity to ratify the Holland amendment. Almost certainly not more than one or two would do so. This would mean that the refusal to act of only two or a few more States would be sufficient to kill the amendment. In view of the sentiments of some of the border States and the close alliance of some of the smaller States with the South, this would be likely to happen. Therefore I strongly doubt whether the amendment would ever get the necessary ratifications. States which cast only about one-sixth of the vote in the presidential election of 1960 would be able to defeat the will of States with five-sixths of the voters.

Madam President, I now come to a delicate matter, but I think I am in conformity with the established usages of the Senate:

Since private conversations on this matter have been repeated on the floor of the Senate by those most anxious to observe the procedures of the Senate, I assume that it will not be amiss if I relate a conversation which I had on this subject with the senior Senator from Florida shortly after I came to the Senate many years ago. When the Senator from Florida solicited my support for his amendment, I expressed my belief that it would be defeated because the Southern States would not ratify. I said I might look favorably upon the proposal if a hundred southern political leaders would sign a roundrobin letter stating that they would not only urge their respective State legislatures to ratify the amendment but also personally would pledge that they would work actively to that end. That challenge ended our conversation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator recall that the Senator from Florida told the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Florida would appear before his own State legislature and ask for ratification by his State of the amendment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not quite remember that, but if the Senator from Florida so states, I am sure it is so.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is in the RECORD in several places, during the course of the debates.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Florida is a very truthful man. Of course we accept his statement. No one else has however come forward that I know of.

It is certainly clear, from the way in which the current filibuster has been joined in by the overwhelming proportion of the southern Senators, that such a pledge will never be given, instead the congressional leaders from this section who are so generally esteemed at home can be confidently predicted to use their great influence against ratification just as they have used it to prevent even consideration of the amendment.

To adopt the method of trying to abolish the poll tax by the route of a constitutional amendment is, therefore, in all probability, to lead us down a blind alley, to consume a great deal of precious time, and to lead only to ultimate frustration and defeat.

If, however, we pass the statutory amendment advocated by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and others of us, it would in the normal course of events go into effect immediately. If it were defied by some States, then court tests could be arranged fairly quickly and appeals decided. If the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the act, this would finish the matter, because I cannot believe that Southern States would defy the solemn judgment of the Court upon such a matter.

There is another point which has been touched upon in the debate. That is, if we adopt the route of a constitutional amendment in the matter of the poll tax, it will be very difficult for us to use the method of statutory amendment as the administration intends in the case of helping to define the conditions under which the literacy test can be applied. The abandonment of the statutory amendment in the present case will be treated as indicating a disbelief in the constitutionality of the literacy test provisions on the part of those who are its advocates. While lawyers may argue that literacy tests can be distinguished from poll taxes by reason of their being more subject to the 15th amendment, the precedent will operate in the minds of many against a literacy test statute.

Some of the proponents of the Holland amendment may justify it in the cloakrooms on the alleged ground that it will be easier to pass it through Congress than it would be to enact a statute. It is hoped it will not be filibustered as hard as a statutory enactment might be. It is hoped that our southern friends will not really resist the amendment method, which the Senator from Florida has proposed.

While it is still not clear as to what are the final intentions of our friends from the South, the filibuster which has been carried on by them for nearly 2 weeks would seem to indicate that this hope is illusory and that the amendment method would be fought as bitterly as would be that of statutory enactment.

It should also be remembered that there is a considerable body of opinion in Congress which, for reasons I have mentioned, is conscientiously opposed to the use of the constitutional amendment. This sentiment was strong enough 2 years ago to prevent the Holland amendment from even being considered in the House.

As the Senator from New York pointed out, the statutory method has been approved on numerous occasions in the House. This opposition might likely be much stronger in the Senate than it was 2 years ago. It should be remembered that a two-thirds vote of both Houses is necessary for Congress to submit a constitutional amendment for ratification to the States. Therefore, even if the opposition to the amendment in Congress were not able to muster a majority of the Members of either House, its Members might very well be able to obtain more than a third of the votes and hence to defeat the amendment.

In contrast to all this, the method of legal enactment would only require a majority for it to be passed. In addition, the Javits substitute has been precisely tailored to meet the structural defects of the Holland amendment.

I ask the sincere opponents of the poll tax to consider these tactical considerations very carefully before they conclude that the Holland tunnel is the best route to the desired destination.

VI. DEFECTS IN THE ORIGINAL HOLLAND AMENDMENT

This brings us to the crucial defects within the original Holland amendment itself which were not detected when this proposal was before us 2 years ago.

I ask Senators to read the original section 2:

> Nothing in this article shall be construed to invalidate any provision of law denying the right to vote to paupers or persons supported at public expense or by charitable institutions.

When this section was first included in the Holland amendment a few years ago, I thought it referred to the largely inoperative pauper laws of nine States, primarily in New England, and which are no real barrier to voting.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield. I thought at that time that there were nine. Apparently there are 12.

Mr. HOLLAND. There are 12 States, 3 in the South and 9 in other parts of the country.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I find that the Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. The uniform statement of all lawyers who have gone into that question is that each of the laws was passed in an effort to protect the purity of the ballot, because of the fact that people had voted against their will when they were inhabitants of a poorhouse or of a similar institution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

We have been trying to trace the history of section 2.

I think it is accurate to say that this provision was not included in earlier versions of the Holland amendment, and was first included in the measure proposed in the 83d Congress. It was included then without an explanation of the reason for its inclusion.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator certainly has not had an opportunity to read the record of the hearings. The Senator from Florida has very carefully explained, at the various hearings before subcommittees of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, the origin and the reason for the inclusion of that section.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was referring to the time when the measure was originally introduced. I was not aware of the fact that the Senator had given the reasons for its original adoption. When I studied this question last week in some detail there seemed to me to be some evidence that it was what was popularly known as a sleeper or joker. Let me say that I do not wish to question the intent of the Senator from Florida. I merely submit that the sweeping terms of the amendment would have encouraged several States to disfranchise a much greater number of citizens than those who are now barred by the poll tax, because there was an explicit statement that the prohibitions against the poll tax as a requirement for voting were not to apply to property qualifications, to paupers, to those receiving public assistance, or to those supported by charitable institutions.

For example, those who receive public relief, or what is known as general assistance, are certainly being "supported at public expense" and hence could be made ineligible to vote. Last November these numbered 394,000 cases in the country as a whole. Of those, 39,669 were in the 11 Southern States, and 13,429 were in the five poll tax States. Also, in November 1961 there were 2,273,000 recipients of old-age assistance. These were also supported at public expense, both State and National, and hence could be disfranchised. No less than 891,045 of those were in the 11 States of the Old South and 170,274 were in the five poll tax States.

Similarly during November of 1961 there were 908,000 families in the country receiving aid to dependent children. Of those 201,791 were in the Old South and 77,961 in the poll tax States. The mothers in those States could clearly have been made ineligible to vote. While it is probable that those in receipt of old-age security payments toward which the aged persons had themselves contributed could not be held to be "supported at public expense," this section could have been used to exclude the 64,000 who are now receiving benefits under the Kerr-Mills Act.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator is not presuming that merely because a State would have power to do what the Senator has suggested, the State would do it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It does not necessarily follow, but a very explicit hint is given that if it wished to take that action, it could do so. I am speaking of the original Holland amendment. It specifically stated that it did not apply to paupers, to those receiving public assistance, or to those supported by charitable institutions. So I should say the handkerchief was dropped, so to speak, and the legislature could take the hint very readily.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Madam President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe I have heard of some people who were silly enough to suggest that such action ought to be taken, but I do not think those people have much chance of being effective.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They do not need to do it now, because they have a poll tax. But if the poll tax were abolished, they could obtain the same end by the other methods suggested.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the Senator would be interested to know that in States where such provisions have existed and exist now, either statutes clearly state or the courts have clearly held that the payment of Federal assistance cannot be held to create paupership such as is covered by the provisions of the laws of those States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What I am trying to say is that the restrictions could be very readily tightened by further legislative enactment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Aside from the generosity of the Senator in having said that he would not accuse the Senator from Florida of putting a sleeper in the amendment which I have presented, the Senator might also have commented that it would be practically impossible to put a sleeper in a bill of the import of the amendment before us that would fool 100 Senators and, in 1960, would have fooled them so badly that 72 Senators, including, I believe, the Senator from Illinois, voted for the measure.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was more naive in 1960 than I am today. I talked with several of the 68 sponsors of the Holland amendment. I pointed out section 2 to them and they said, "Good heavens. Did I sponsor section 2? I must have sponsored it in an unwary moment."

We all remember how the Bricker amendment came before the Senate with more than two-thirds of the Senators sponsoring the amendment. We all remember how the discussion of the Bricker amendment developed. We could not muster a two-thirds vote because a great many of the so-called sponsors had put their names on the amendment without knowing the full import of what had happened.

The Senator from Florida has such a disarming manner and such a gentle and genteel approach with which he confronts his fellow Senators in the cloakroom that it is very hard to resist the seductive arguments which he advances.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the kind words of the Senator from Illinois, even though he is slaying me with kindness. I invite his attention to the fact that the Senator from Florida has not lobbied in behalf of his amendment. He has argued it in full and in the open at every hearing that was held. He has debated it in full on the floor of the Senate. He would have had to be very keen indeed to have fooled the former majority leader, the then Senator JOHNSON, and the minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. He would have to be equally clever to have fooled the present majority leader, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the same minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The Senator from Florida had a good amendment. He has retained more than 95 percent of it. He has omitted the part that he did omit against the specific request of the Department of Justice, because the Department preferred my original amendment. There are those who thought that that factor might have been used to help defeat the measure, even as the Senator from Illinois, now when the provision about which he speaks does not even exist, is seeking to prevent Senators from fairly considering the present amendment.

So apparently there was merit in the opinion of the majority leader and others that those provisions, though fair, and without great flaw of their own, might be used by Senators who favored something else to put the original amendment in a false light.

But the Senator comforts himself with the thought that even the Senator from Illinois voted for the measure in 1960. He appreciates that vote. He thinks it was based on sound conscience, and he regrets that the Senator from Illinois will not have an opportunity to vote for the precise amendment again, as he believes he would.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Madam President, I was trying to lay a historical basis for discussion on this point. Having detected the weaknesses I have indicated, and having consulted with some of my colleagues, I had drafted a series of amendments to the Holland proposal which would have eliminated the explicit encouragement which the original text of the Holland amendment gave to those devices. I was on my feet last night and on the point of offering such amendments when the Senator from Florida himself came forward with a revised draft, which was identical with the amendments which I had prepared, with certain exceptions. I thought it was a case of either conscious or unconscious parallelism in action.

It may be that in this whispering Chamber word gets around very rapidly as to what is intended. It is possible that the knowledge that these amendments would be offered by a bipartisan group of Senators may have caused the Senator from Florida to back up and withdraw section 2. I do not know whether that is the case. However, I will say I am interested that there should be this parallelism of action.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to say to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Illinois, that he should disabuse his mind thoroughly and completely of any such idea, because, as one who was very vitally interested in this legislation, and who held a series of meetings over the past 4 or 5 days, I assure the Senator that to the best of our knowledge we had no idea that any Member of the Senate was in the process of considering amendments to the proposal which finally emerged. That ought to be clear for the RECORD. If we had known about the Senator from Illinois considering such a proposal I am quite certain we would have gotten in touch with him in one way or another.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not say "conscious parallelism." I said it might well have been "unconscious parallelism."

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Just as the Senator has confessed that he did not know that the Senator from Florida had amended his amendment until it was presented to the Senate, so the Senator from Florida did not know that the Senator from Illinois had any intention of submitting his amendment. Not being gifted with the power of reading minds and not having been in close contact with the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I had no idea that our minds were running in the same direction, although I was very glad to learn, in the colloquy last night, that this was the fact. I thought that the fact that our minds were running in the same direction would lead the Senator from Illinois to see the justice of the amendment. I still have hope for my friend from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must say that the present draft is a distinct improvement over the first one. If the first draft had been continued in the form in which it was originally submitted, I should have been conscientiously advised to oppose the amendment and to urge other Senators to oppose it similarly. I would have made the frank statement that I am wiser now than I was in 1960, which in itself is an indication that we can improve with time.

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. We all should admit that we can improve. However, I wish to call attention to the fact that the original amendment to which the Senator refers was submitted in 1953, and has been in that identical form from then until now. Therefore, it would not have taken any great prescience to learn what was in it in the intervening 9 years.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I believe 1960 was the first time that it came before the Senate.

The statements of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Illinois appear in the colloquy in the final pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for yesterday.

I am not quite certain what the provision with respect to the property qualification meant. There is the explicit provision in the original form of the amendment to prevent a State from denying the right to vote to paupers and to persons supported in charitable institutions, for example.

The present draft is a distinct improvement.

There is a point which I wish to emphasize very strongly. While the new language does not encourage disqualification on all of these grounds, it most certainly does not forbid them. It is silent on these matters. It leaves, therefore, a constitutional vacuum into which States which want to restrict the franchise could move. Could they not impose rather severe property qualifications, since this is not forbidden in the amendment? Could they not disqualify those on relief, since this is not forbidden in the amendment?

Could they not disqualify those receiving old-age assistance, because this is not forbidden in the amendment? The same would apply with respect to those receiving payments for dependent children or those living in old people's homes. Disqualification on these grounds is not forbidden in the amendment.

I believe such disqualification would be against the spirit of the amendment, but would it be technically forbidden?

Mr. HOLLAND. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that exactly the same situation would exist if the Javits amendment were adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not quite.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I am glad the Senator has brought up this very important point, and I am very glad that we can clarify the situation. In the first place, my amendment contains the words "or other tax or to impose a property qualification." The language is found at page 2, lines 15 and 16. That is forbidden as a prerequisite for registering to vote or voting.

That is the first point, and it is a very important point.

In the second place, let us remember that what we do is to give us the flexibility of a statute, so that if there is abuse we can move into it and act on it; whereas what the Senator from Florida would have us do is take the constitutional amendment route. Then we are lashed to two propositions; first, that we then can implement whatever it says, and whatever it does not say we cannot implement. If we want to change it, we can only move by way of a constitutional amendment, because we have moved, in the first instance, by the constitutional amendment route.

I respectfully submit that here is a very powerful reason why we should proceed by the statutory route and not by the constitutional amendment route. I am very grateful to the Senator for bringing up this point.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Madam President, I believe the Senator has made a very powerful argument.

With the limited amount of time at our disposal, I certainly am not ready at this moment to propose a further amendment to the Holland amendment, which would specifically outlaw such attempts. A provision in the Constitution must be drafted with great care. We have largely met this difficulty in the statute which the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] is proposing, by outlawing all property qualifications for voting.

VII. ABOLISHMENT OF RESTRICTIONS ON VOTING FUNDAMENTALLY WILL CONTRIBUTE TO FREEDOM AND DEMOCRACY

Now, Madam President, if I may finish, I would say that those of us who want to give all literate Americans the right to vote, whether they be black or white, and who desire that everyone may be treated as a child of the Devine Spirit, and consequently given an adequate opportunity to develop educationally, economically, culturally, and politically, are always subject to two sets of criticism.

On the one hand, we are accused of violating the rules, customs, and procedures of the Senate, which, as an eminent southern writer has correctly said, are the South's revenge for Appomattox. Then close behind this criticism follows the charge that we are antisouthern and are trying to heap indignity and disgrace upon that section of the country. We are presented to the world and to the South as being brutally unchivalrous and as offending the unappeasable honor of the South.

All this despite the fact that at no time has any member of the civil rights group attacked the South. We have, on the contrary, been careful to say that we in the North and the West have our weaknesses and sins on these matters as well, and that we should eliminate them in the North as rapidly as possible. We have not felt any self-righteousness, and I hope we have not expressed any. We have been careful indeed to point out that we of the North were delivered from the terrible curse of slavery not by any superiority in moral character but, instead, by the fortunate accident of a colder climate and a less fertile soil.

I hope I will not offend my southern friends if I say that they are in a sense prisoners of history and geography.

Madam President, we are trying, in fact, to free all of our friends, both South and North, from the forces which imprison so many. We know that many of what are upheld as basic institutions of the South are not really supported by the majority of the southern people but are, instead, imposed by a relatively small uppercrust who are dominant and who control overwhelmingly the agencies of information and propaganda. We want to set free the economically disfranchised majority of the South, both white and black alike. We want to open up the doors of more adequate education for the disinherited, both white and black alike. We want to open up the gates of opportunity so that the abilities of white and black alike may function more effectively. To do all these things, we of the civil rights group in the North are willing to pay more taxes. For we know that in this Nation, we are brothers, one of another, and should help to bear the burden of the States which have a low income per capita.

Yes, and we believe that if we can but put these programs into effect and arrange a reconciliation between presently conflicting groups, we can free even those who now despise us from the obsessions which now possess them and so enable their natural and generous emotions and abilities to be devoted to constructive ends. We seek to do this in the true spirit of friendship and without any sanctimonious self-righteousness.

Perhaps we cannot convince our friends that this is so. These are vested interests in misunderstanding which are hard to supersede and it is difficult to keep on a friendly course when one's motives and conduct are systematically misunderstood and misinterpreted. But we shall nevertheless keep on trying and if we should slip now and then, we ask to be forgiven. For that does not represent the deepest desires of our hearts. I am not at all certain that the world as we know it will survive the possible Armageddon of a nuclear holocaust. If it does not, it is better for us to go out on a note of brotherhood rather than as querulous and hateridden creatures. And certainly our chances of survival are greater if we can be both free and united in brotherhood. For it is true now as it was in olden times that where there is no vision the people perish.

If the poll tax is a restriction on voting rather than a qualification for voting, Congress could abolish it for Federal elections without violating the constitutional prohibition against the qualification for voters and electors for national office and State legislatures.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I think the whole Nation must be proud of the Senator from Illinois, whether one agrees with him or not, and grateful to him for the tone of what he has said. I, as also a person who feels very strongly about these problems, as he does, represent a community which, on the whole, feels the same way. It is an enormous community, containing 10 percent of the population of the United States.

I wish to associate myself especially with the words "sanctimonious righteousness." I feel no such thing. We understand very deeply the reasons and the bases of the currents which are at work here; but I also feel, with the Senator from Illinois, that in a time of such peril, there is all the more reason for doing our utmost to sound the clarion call for morality and fidelity to the guarantees of our Constitution.

The Senator from Illinois has made a trenchant speech. One could comment on it at great length. But if I did so, it would depreciate from the lofty tone which the Senator from Illinois has used. So I leave it at that and express gratitude at being associated with a man of such luminous intelligence in a cause so worthy as this one.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from New York.

Madam President, we in Illinois know that we have many faults concerning this matter. We in the city of Chicago, which I love, know that in many respects we have fallen short of our ideals. However, it is the intention of all our citizens to push forward and to remove these difficulties as rapidly as possible. They are difficulties which, in the main, are not legal, but social. All I seek to do is to attempt to remove some of the legal difficulties which are impediments. I hope very much that in the months and years ahead we may move forward.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Madam President, the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] raises two fundamental questions: Whether the statutory approach to this proposal is constitutional; and whether, if the Senate should adopt such an approach, Congress would be likely to complete action on it.

I shall not add to the already considerable flow of words on this subject by discussing the constitutionality of the Senator's amendment. I shall only state my conviction that the adoption of the statutory approach would be certain to delay the abolition of the poll tax as a prerequisite for voting. In my opinion, those who seek to end the poll tax will support the Holland amendment, and will oppose the statutory approach.

Madam President, I move that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York be laid on the table.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, will the Senator from Montana withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Madam President, I withhold my motion.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I wish the RECORD to reflect that the voting package in respect to the implementation of the recommendations of the Civil Rights Commission was introduced by my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING]. The only reason I have moved as I have with respect to the proposal now before the Senate is that I had done so once before, in 1960. So I carry the matter on at this time. I simply desired that the RECORD be explicit about that.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from New York.

Madam President, I renew my motion that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York be laid on the table.

Before the vote is taken, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Madam President, on the motion to lay on the table, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I announce that the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] are absent on official business.

On this vote, the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Alaska would vote "nay," and the Senator from Tennessee would vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] is absent because of illness.

If present and voting, the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 34, as follows:

[No. 32 Leg.]

YEAS—59

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Aiken | Hayden | Moss |
| Anderson | Hickenlooper | Mundt |
| Bible | Hickey | Murphy |
| Boggs | Hill | Muskie |
| Burdick | Holland | Pearson |
| Byrd, Va. | Hruska | Prouty |
| Byrd, W. Va. | Johnston | Randolph |
| Cannon | Jordan | Robertson |
| Carlson | Kefauver | Russell |
| Chavez | Kerr | Saltonstall |
| Cotton | Long, Hawaii | Smathers |
| Curtis | Long, La. | Smith, Maine |
| Dirksen | Mansfield | Sparkman |
| Dworshak | McClellan | Stennis |
| Eastland | McGee | Talmadge |
| Ellender | McNamara | Thurmond |
| Engle | Metcalf | Tower |
| Ervin | Miller | Williams, Del. |
| Fulbright | Monroney | Yarborough |
| Goldwater | Morton | |

NAYS—34

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Allott | Hart | Neuberger |
| Beall | Hartke | Pastore |
| Bush | Humphrey | Pell |
| Carroll | Jackson | Proxmire |
| Case, N.J. | Javits | Scott |
| Church | Keating | Smith, Mass. |
| Clark | Kuchel | Symington |
| Cooper | Lausche | Wiley |
| Dodd | Long, Mo. | Williams, N.J. |
| Douglas | Magnuson | Young, Ohio |
| Fong | McCarthy | |
| Gruening | Morse | |

NOT VOTING—7

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Bartlett | Capehart | Young, N. Dak. |
| Bennett | Case, S. Dak. | |
| Butler | Gore | |

So Mr. MANSFIELD's motion to lay the Javits amendment on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Madam President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. DIRKSEN. Madam President, I should like to query the majority leader at this time as to whether he has canvassed the situation so far as other amendments are concerned, and what the Senate may expect by way of business for the rest of the day.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Madam President, in response to the question raised by the distinguished minority leader, to the best of my knowledge I believe there will be only one other amendment, that to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], and I am under the impression that will not take too much time.

It is hoped, with the cooperation of the Senate, that it might be possible to finish consideration of the pending business tonight, and I ask Senators to help the distinguished minority leader and me in trying to bring about that sort of conclusion.

THE ALEXANDER HAMILTON NATIONAL MONUMENT — AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION DEALING WITH POLL TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 29) providing for the establishing of the former dwelling house of Alexander Hamilton as a national monument.

Mr. BUSH. Madam President, I call up my amendment in the nature of a substitute for the Holland amendment, which I sent to the desk this afternoon, and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut in the nature of a substitute for the so-called Holland amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the following articles are hereby proposed as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, both or either of which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of their submission by the Congress:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"ARTICLE —

"The people of the District constituting the seat of the Government of the United States shall be entitled to elect two Members to the Senate and a number of Members to the House of Representatives equal to the number of Members of the House of Representatives to which a State having the same population as such District would be entitled. The Members authorized by this article shall be elected at such time and in such manner, and the electors of such Members shall have such qualifications, as the Congress shall provide by law."

Mr. BUSH. Madam President, the purpose of the amendment is merely to give to the people of the District of Columbia, which is the seat of government for the United States, an entitlement to elect two Members of the U.S. Senate and a number of Members of the House of Representatives equal to the number of Members of the House to which a State having the same population as the District of Columbia would be entitled.

(At this point Mr. METCALF assumed the chair.)

Buff Smith

Practical Dixie Politicians Helped Dig Poll Tax Grave

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

The poll tax in Virginia and four other Southern states has managed to withstand repeated assaults, both internal and Federal, for more than two generations.

Now it faces another attack, this one formidable indeed. The Senate has approved a proposed constitutional amendment to bar the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting in Federal elections.

The measure is supported by the Kennedy Administration and seems to have a good chance of House approval. Once sprung loose from the parliamentary grip of Southerners in Congress, the amendment's ratification by the necessary three-fourths of the states would seem assured.

THIS PROSPECT has again focused attention on the poll tax and its history, and raised the question of whether it is a significant deterrent to voting.

The first poll tax era in the United States came after the Revolutionary War and was aimed at broadening suffrage. In those days, many states permitted only property owners to vote. The poll tax was imposed as a substitute for property qualifications.

The second era came after the Civil War and had the opposite aim. From Florida in 1889 to Georgia in 1908, the former Confederate states enacted the poll tax as part of a program of disfranchisement.

Negro voters were the primary target, as evidenced by Carter Glass who told the 1901 Virginia Constitutional Convention that "Negro enfranchisement was a crime to begin with."

BUT POOR and illiterate whites were a target in many states, too, because the Populist Party was getting enough of their votes to threaten the Democratic Party's predominance in the South.

Six of the poll tax states abolished it later—beginning with North Carolina in 1920, followed by Louisiana, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina and, in 1953, Tennessee.

It was usually the practical politicians, like "Kingfish" Huey Long in Louisiana and Eugene Talmadge in Georgia, who were primarily responsible for repeal after deciding abolition of the tax would help them politically.

In the accompanying table, the six states are marked with an asterisk. Together with the five states still retaining the poll tax—Texas, Arkansas, Virginia, Alabama and Mississippi—they rank at the bottom in the percentage of persons of voting age who cast ballots in the 1960 presidential election.

This shows that the poll tax should not be considered the sole cause for low voter participation in the South.

OTHER FACTORS include restrictive registration procedures applied discriminately, the one-party system and, before it was invalidated by the courts, the white primary — all of which have tended to develop an apathy and instill over a long time a tradition of nonvoting.

The anti-poll tax amendment is a part of the drive to break this tradition. The Justice Department is striking at overt efforts to thwart Negroes from registering. Congress has a bill to bar unfair literacy tests. Voter campaigns by civil rights groups and other organizations have been stepped up and are being better coordinated than ever before.

In Virginia, as in other poll tax states, the amount of the tax certainly was a deterrent in the early 1900s. But in these days, the $1.50 annual tax in Virginia, which is cumulative for three years, is not that important. More important as a deterrent is the time of payment.

Virginians must have their poll taxes paid six months before the general election. Colin C. MacPherson, Arlington County treasurer, said that many residents there, who could easily afford the tax, are kept from voting because they neglect to meet the deadline.

BUT VOTER campaigns in Arlington have helped. In 1951, MacPherson said, 43 per cent of the persons assessed for poll taxes didn't pay them. By last year, the figure had dropped to 28 per cent.

Defenders of the poll tax in Virginia often say that it helps keep uninformed, unintelligent and corrupt persons from voting.

However, the Old Dominion has had enough election irregularities to shake this classic argument for the poll tax.

And paying the tax of others to buy votes has not been an unusual practice in Virginia.

WHEN A GENERAL ASSEMBLY committee was considering anti-poll tax legislation last month, State Sen. Harry Stuart of Elk Garden appealed for repeal.

"This is not a political matter, gentle-

South at the Bottom of Voter Percentage

THE FOLLOWING table shows the percentage by states of persons of voting age who cast ballots in the 1960 presidential election. The five former Confederate states retaining the poll tax as a prerequisite for voting are printed in capital letters. The six former Confederate states which have abolished the poll tax are marked with an asterisk (*). In the Nation as a whole, 63.66 per cent of the persons of voting age went to the polls in the 1960 presidential election.

| State | Per Cent Voting | Rank 1960 | Rank 1956 |
|---|---|---|---|
| Idaho | 80.64 | 1 | 1 |
| Utah | 80.12 | 2 | 3 |
| New Hampshire | 79.35 | 3 | 9 |
| North Dakota | 78.30 | 4 | 22 |
| South Dakota | 78.06 | 5 | 11 |
| West Virginia | 77.37 | 6 | 12 |
| Minnesota | 77.06 | 7 | 20 |
| Connecticut | 76.86 | 8 | 2 |
| Indiana | 76.85 | 9 | 7 |
| Massachusetts | 76.08 | 10 | 4 |
| Illinois | 75.73 | 11 | 8 |
| Rhode Island | 75.18 | 12 | 5 |
| Iowa | 74.93 | 13 | 6 |
| Wyoming | 73.68 | 14 | 17 |
| Wisconsin | 73.44 | 15 | 24 |
| Delaware | 73.40 | 16 | 14 |
| Maine | 72.63 | 17 | 30 |
| Michigan | 72.44 | 18 | 25 |
| Washington | 72.29 | 19 | 23 |
| Vermont | 72.29 | 20 | 18 |
| Oregon | 72.22 | 21 | 19 |
| New Jersey | 71.82 | 22 | 15 |
| Missouri | 71.73 | 23 | 21 |
| Montana | 71.46 | 24 | 10 |
| Nebraska | 71.44 | 25 | 32 |
| Colorado | 71.38 | 26 | 16 |
| Ohio | 71.27 | 27 | 27 |
| Pennsylvania | 70.52 | 28 | 29 |
| Kansas | 70.27 | 29 | 13 |
| California | 67.36 | 30 | 34 |
| New York | 67.00 | 31 | 26 |
| Oklahoma | 63.77 | 32 | 31 |
| Kentucky | 63.71 | 33 | 35 |
| New Mexico | 62.07 | 34 | 33 |
| Nevada | 61.14 | 35 | 28 |
| Maryland | 57.18 | 36 | 36 |
| Arizona | 54.37 | 37 | 37 |
| *North Carolina | 53.53 | 38 | 39 |
| Hawaii | 53.16 | 39 | — |
| *Tennessee | 50.26 | 40 | 40 |
| *Florida | 50.00 | 41 | 38 |
| Alaska | 49.19 | 42 | — |
| *Louisiana | 44.78 | 43 | 42 |
| TEXAS | 41.77 | 44 | 43 |
| ARKANSAS | 41.13 | 45 | 41 |
| VIRGINIA | 33.33 | 46 | 44 |
| *Georgia | 32.85 | 47 | 45 |
| ALABAMA | 31.07 | 48 | 46 |
| *South Carolina | 30.56 | 49 | 47 |
| MISSISSIPPI | 25.44 | 50 | 48 |

ians

rave

olition of the tax olitically.

nying table, the six with an asterisk. Toe states still retain-
Texas, Arkansas, Virnd Mississippi—they in the percentage of age who cast ballots ential election.

the poll tax should he sole cause for low in the South.

S include restrictive dures applied dis-
ne-party system and,
idated by the courts,
— all of which have an apathy and instill a tradition of non-amendment is a part ak this tradition. The is striking at overt egroes from register-a bill to bar unfair

r campaigns by civil other organizations l up and are being than ever before.

other poll tax states, tax certainly was a rly 1900s. But in these nual tax in Virginia,
e for three years, is . More important as time of payment.

have their poll taxes fore the general elec-acPherson, Arlington said that many resiould easily afford the voting because they deadline.

mpaigns in Arlington
951, MacPherson said, persons assessed for ay them. By last year, pped to 28 per cent.
e poll tax in Virginia
elps keep uninformed, corrupt persons from ld Dominion has had regularities to shake ent for the poll tax.

tax of others to buy
n an unusual practice

NERAL ASSEMBLY
nsidering anti-poll tax onth, State Sen. Har-Garden appealed for

olitical matter, gentle-

Negroes queued up to vote in the 1946 primary at Marietta, Ga., after the state repealed its poll tax. This line was more than two blocks long.

men," he said. "This is an economic matter. It costs me $5000 every time my election comes up."

The movement for repeal of the poll tax in Virginia came in 1940 when a group of liberal Democrats decided its abolition was the key to the defeat of the Byrd machine. The movement coincided with the national drive for social reform that came in with the New Deal.

IN THE 1940s, the Virginia Electoral Reform League campaigned vigorously for repeal. At its first convention in 1947, the Virginia League of Women Voters took aim at the poll tax and the women have been fighting it ever since.

In 1949, Virginians got a chance to vote on constitutional amendments that would abolish the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting. The voters gave a loud "no."

It was a confusing situation, this campaign and vote on the "Campbell Amendments," as they were called.

It was a package deal which either had to be entirely rejected or entirely approved. Besides abolishing the poll tax, the proposal also would have substituted annual for permanent registration, authorized literacy tests and any "further requirements" the General Assembly might think of, and instituted a $3 nonsuffrage poll tax.

IN OTHER WORDS, the package would have made voting harder, not easier. Many Byrd machine stalwarts supported the amendments, including Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.) himself. Many anti-Byrd leaders, including poll tax repealers, opposed them.

Since then, the Byrd machine has backed no repeal proposal. Assembly committees it controls have thwarted continued efforts to get another and simpler constitutional amendment through the Assembly. In recent years, this has been easy because the days of "massive resistance" made the climate non conducive to helping Negroes vote.

The other day, before the U. S. Senate passed the proposed constitutional amendment to bar the poll tax in Federal elections, Byrd joined the amiable Dixie filibuster and said he saw no evidence of significant interest in the poll tax among Virginians.

YET HIS FOLLOWERS in Virginia's General Assembly earlier this year had killed proposals to have an advisory referendum on the subject which would have shown if there is much interest or not.

The role of the poll tax in Virginia is, together with other restrictions, to keep a limited electorate, which is more easily controlled by the Byrd organization.

Those who oppose it now have hope that it will be abolished and look to the Federal Government for help.

4-28-62

land must first take control of this party and then take control of the country via an election before it can hope for any real progress. In the meantime, the Conservatives can ignore them. In Canada, the most militant peace forces created the New Democratic Party; the effect was to split the peace vote, making it possible for the Conservative Party to remain in uneasy control.

Women's Strike for Peace wants to avoid being identified as a splinter of one party or another. The civil-rights movement wisely avoided the temptation to establish a third party; instead, it succeeded in getting the two major parties bidding for their vote. Thus, to succeed they need only muster a vote big enough to swing the balance of power.

THE women realize that their power is in the "swing" vote. They have organized an ambitious petition campaign to muster one million voters who will vote, not the party, but the issue. They point out that Mr. Kennedy won in 1962 by only 168,000 votes. Some election districts are won regularly by less than 100 votes. In a close contest, the women and their petition-signers could hold the balance of power.

The petition, addressed to candidates and party chairmen, states:

> Because the drift toward nuclear war threatens the very survival of life on earth, the time has come when personal and national interests must be secondary to the interests of all mankind. We who go to the polls in 1962—and those whom we elect there—will bear the gravest responsibility in the world's history.
>
> Therefore, we, the undersigned, promise our vote to the candidates, regardless of political party, who will actively support the following principles in their election campaigns and during their terms in office:
>
> 1. No more testing of nuclear weapons;
> 2. No further dispersion of nuclear arms;
> 3. Conversion of economy to peace basis;
> 4. Continuation of disarmament negotiations until agreement is reached;
> 5. Expansion of peace agencies, i.e., Disarmament Agency, etc.;
> 6. Action in areas where agreement has been reached, such as exploration of outer space;
> 7. Strengthening the peace-keeping machinery of the U.N.

The women plan to use the petition to force rival candidates for office into real debate. This approach, they point out, is far less expensive than backing candidates or starting a new party—and it is faster.

In New York State, the stage is now being set for such a debate. Senator Jacob Javits (R.), up for re-election, told the Rochester Times-Union that the "three major issues this fall will be peace, the rate of economic growth and equal opportunities for all people." He told the Independent Political Forum that "of course" he concurred with many points of the petition, but that he had "little patience with people who just want us to stop testing regardless of what the Russians do."

As the peace movement becomes increasingly political, it will be increasingly respected. The candidates who continue to do homage to the corpse of McCarthyism, and the peace workers who continue to fear it, will be left behind. Whereas SANE continues to feel it is political suicide to attend peace conferences attended or organized by Communists, the Women's Strike for Peace, in a no-nonsense, feminine approach, points out that we will never reach an understanding with the Russians about the survival of mankind if we are afraid to talk to them. One woman, asked if she wasn't afraid that the Communists might take over the Women's Strike for Peace, responded in eager fashion: "Do you know a Communist? Would you go get her? I'm working twenty hours a day for peace. I'd just love for someone to come take over a little typing and answer the phone." She reports, in mock disappointment, that no one seems to be able to find her a Communist willing to work that hard.

THIS is typical of the saucy, good-humored and optimistic approach of the women's groups and the independent, local peace groups which have sprung up around the country. They have brushed aside all the old stereotypes and are busily trying to save the world in the best American tradition. They are democratic and creative and not afraid to use their Constitutional rights. In contrast with the cynicism of many old-time liberals, they have a deep faith in their fellow man and in their own abilities to affect the course of events.

By 1964, this energetic group is determined to make peace the dominant issue in the Presidential campaign.

Duff. Jm.

2. Freedom Riders to the Polls . . by Staughton Lynd

Atlanta, Ga.

AT THE WEEK-LONG convention here of the NAACP, delegates repeatedly heard their leaders tell them to "go political." "The ballot is one of the most vital instruments of power," said Bishop Spottswood, chairman of the board of directors. Clarence Mitchell, director of the organization's Washington bureau, spoke of a "Civil Rights Party" to open the way for more than token appointment of Negroes to high political positions. "If you think you will ever get these things without the ballot," echoed James Nabrit, president of Howard University, "you don't belong in the twentieth century"; the white man, Nabrit continued, is "motivated by respect for the black vote." And Martin Luther King added, "With the ballot, we will be able to elect Negro Congressmen right here in the South."

A year ago, student activists in the Southern civil-rights movement would have dismissed this appeal with a smilingly contemptuous reference to NAACP conservatism. At that time, voter registration, like reliance on the courts, seemed to the students a siren song designed to lure them away from the new frontier of direct action. Freedom Rides and the concept of "jail without bail" then held the center of the stage. As recently as last December, the Albany (Ga.) Movement provided the most dramatic example of mass direct action since Montgomery. Events in that city embodied all three elements of a new direct-action strategy which then seemed in the making: (1) The resolve, by accepting jail without bail, to "wear them down with our suffering" rather than to coerce through legal or economic pressure; (2) the combination of local initiative with the supporting participation of outsiders (notably, in the case of Albany, several workers of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee who had been active there throughout the fall); (3) the involvement of all groups in the Negro community in civil disobedience—all prepared to accept imprisonment rather than to endure injustice. A strategy developing along these lines would have brought the American movement much more closely into line with the Gandhian precedents which it has always professed to follow.

STAUGHTON LYND is on the faculty of Spelman College (Atlanta, Ga.).

AS IT TURNED out, however, the Albany Movement, and with it the entire civil-rights movement, took a different course. Within hours of Dr. King's appeal for a national pilgrimage to Albany, local leaders of the protest entered into a compromise agreement. The imprisoned (Dr. King among them) came out of jail. The students expelled from Albany State College, and the Albany workers of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, turned to voter registration. (Today's recurrence of tension in Albany arises out of the initial direct-action policies. But as late as June 2, Dr. King told his followers: "The central front . . . is that of suffrage.")

Two months later, here in Atlanta, a similar transition occurred in the work of the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights. This is the committee of students at the Atlanta University Center which initiated and led the successful 1960-1961 campaign to integrate department store lunch-counters in Atlanta. After lunch-counter integration came off peacefully in the early fall, COAHR started negotiations on integration of Atlanta movie theatres. Such behind-the-scenes work lacked the drama of the mass actions of preceding years, and complaint was widely voiced that the "spirit" of earlier campaigns had evaporated. Perhaps in response to this criticism, the committee launched a dramatic action in February to celebrate the second anniversary of the beginning of the sit-in movement. The action, designed to desegregate the galleries of the Georgia Capitol, eventually misfired, and an unanticipated peripheral demonstration at segregated Grady Hospital resulted in several unplanned arrests. Shaken by adult criticism of these events, the student committee turned its attention to voter registration.

As spring passed into summer, almost every other Southern civil-rights organization — including the Southern Regional Council, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Southern Project of the National Student Association, the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights, and the Albany Movement —gave the impression of putting more and more time and energy into the hitherto neglected work of voter registration. Summer registration drives in selected communities; the coordination of various organizations' registration work under a paid full-time director; monthly workshops wherein Negro community leaders from all over the South are given "citizenship training" — all seemed signs of the new times.

WHY THE new emphasis on voter registration? One hears three sorts of explanation suggested.

1. Direct action, even when coupled with resort to the courts, just hasn't done the job. Albany itself was a striking example of the fact that direct action has been required not only to obtain court decisions, but to enforce them (the immediate cause of the Albany Movement was the arrest of students using the bus terminal on an integrated basis, after the ICC ruling had supposedly solved this problem). School integration, at the present rate, would take a century (this figure is actually over-optimistic because it includes the relatively rapid progress of the Upper South). Moreover, some kinds of segregation do not seem susceptible to direct-action techniques—particularly discrimination in employment and (to a lesser extent) in housing, the two forms of discrimination underlying the continuing segregation in the North.

2. Voter registration has shown its effectiveness in assisting direct action. A good example was Nashville, Tennessee, where in the intervals between direct-action projects, students turned their attention to registration. Participants believe that this two-pronged attack had much to do with the spectacular success at Nashville in opening up facilities in the central city. There may well be a correlation between the number of registered Negro voters in a locality and the degree to which direct-action campaigns succeed quickly and peacefully.

3. The Kennedy Administration and private foundations have encouraged voter registration rather than civil disobedience. This story is told in Capter 17 of Louis Lomax's book, The Negro Revolt. All civil-rights organizations carry an enormous financial burden because of the resourcefulness of Southern states in devising ever-new grounds for jailing civil-rights workers. Foundation money, with the quiet support of the Department of Justice in the background, is tempting indeed.

These inducements to voter-registration campaigning are the more persuasive because of a general sense of uneasiness about the official nonviolent ideology of the civil-rights movement. Viewing social change in the South as a whole, the South has desegregated only when it has been forced to do so. This is not to say that the avoidance of violence is a little matter: far from it. But nonviolence in the sense of avoiding bloodshed is not equivalent to nonviolence in the sense of transforming hostility into love. Direct action has been supplemented by the coercive machinery of the courts, and the direct action itself has succeeded primarily through the coercion of economic boycotts.

In summary, almost a decade after Brown v. Board of Education and the Montgomery boycott, the strategy of direct-cum-legal action has failed to prove itself a comprehensive instrument of social change. It is very slow and very expensive. It is better suited to some kinds of desegregation than to others. Its dramatic victories are too often unenforced. Hence the turning of the civil-rights movement toward voter registration and political action, a turning which foundation money and the present Administration have been only too glad to foster.

THE TURN toward political action is both an opportunity and a danger for the civil-rights movement.

The opportunity should be obvious. Exactly a century ago, the Abolitionist orator Wendell Phillips declared:

> The moment a man becomes valuable or terrible to the politician, his rights will be respected. Give the Negro a vote in his hand, and there is not a politician from Abraham Lincoln down to the laziest loafer in the lowest ward of this city, who would not do him honor. . . . Give a man his vote, you give him tools to work and arms to protect himself. The ballot is the true standing ground of Archimedes, planted on which a man can move his world.

Strong evidence to this effect is the fact that the era of Jim Crow legislation in the South — roughly, from 1895 to 1945 — coincides closely with the period in which the Southern Negro was almost totally deprived of the vote. In Louisiana, for example, there were 130,334 registered Negro voters in 1896, and 1,342 in 1904; in 1947, the figure was still no higher than 10,000 while by 1952 it had jumped back up to 120,000.[1] In 1958, the number of registered Negro voters in Louisiana was almost exactly what it had been sixty-two years earlier, 131,068.[2] In the same year, the total Negro registration in the South was about double what it had been ninety years before, at the height of Reconstruction. But whereas in 1868, something like 75 per cent of Southern Negroes of voting age were registered, in 1958 the figure was about 25 per cent (the figure for Southern whites in 1958 was about 60 per cent).[3]

THE importance of voter registration is particularly striking in the area of economics. Here the Black Muslims have scored their most telling hits against the strategy of Martin Luther King. I heard a professor of mathematics, citing government statistics, compare the American economy to a train in which the Negro is the caboose and the number of cars between the caboose and the engine is constantly increased. The continued and heavy unemployment among low-income Negroes, which runs at a rate roughly two and a half times the rate among whites[4], provides the Muslims both arguments and recruits. It is difficult to see how direct or judicial action can affect this situation. Sweeping governmental action is called for, and the Negro is right to provide himself all possible leverage at the polls.

But the danger of a turn from civil disobedience to conventional politics should also be obvious. One has only to think back to the rapid alteration in the spirit of the labor movement during World War II to appreciate how quickly the civil-rights movement might lose its drive and élan. The organization of the C.I.O., while hardly nonviolent, was otherwise quite similar to the present surge of student action. The civil-rights movement could be patronized and tamed by Kennedy just as the labor movement was by Roosevelt. A tendency toward bureaucracy and toward a loss of vital contact with the rank-and-file is already apparent in the Southern civil-rights organizations, including the student groups. Commitment to the indirections and artificialities of the political game would rapidly accelerate this trend.

IS IT possible to steer between the Scylla of political abstention and the Charybdis of becoming an appendage of the Democratic Party?

The experience of an older civil-rights movement may provide a few clues. Abolitionism, too, passed through a decade of largely extra-political action until, with the formation of the Liberty Party in 1840, it embarked on the course which ended twenty years later with the election of Lincoln. The key to the Abolitionists' success may have been that, even after entering politics, they never abandoned direct action. The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 made every citizen of the North liable to be deputized as a slave-catcher. By defying this law personally, even after the Supreme Court upheld it, Abolitionists kept alive the original spirit of their movement while their political involvement steadily increased.

One hopes, therefore, that as today's civil-rights movement turns toward political action, it will not wholly leave behind the spirit and practice of 1954-1961. Every legal and political gain in the struggle has required direct action to prod it into reality. Even the 1954 Supreme Court decision, which seemed to descend as manna from heaven, was partly, of course, a response to the

---

[1] C. Vann Woodward, The Strange Career of Jim Crow, 2nd ed. (New York, 1957), p. 68; Margaret Price, The Negro Voter in the South (Atlanta, 1957), p. 5.

[2] Margaret Price, The Negro and the Ballot in the South (Atlanta, 1959), p. 9.

[3] John Hope Franklin, Reconstruction After the Civil War (Chicago, 1961), p. 80.

[4] See "Negroes and Jobs," New York Post, Mar. 25, 1962; Ernest Dunbar, "The Negro in America Today," Look, Apr. 10, 1962.

civil disobedience of the Afro-Asian independence movements overseas. Throughout much of the South jail is, and will be for a long time, the place—as Thoreau said—where the man of principle will feel at home.

There is another way in which the spirit of nonviolence will have continuing relevance to the coming period of primarily political action. The curse of the American South has been the "rule-or-ruin" psychology which has repeatedly led its leaders to sacrifice the well-being of the South as a whole in order to retain the privileges of a class. By contrast, the political arm of the Southern civil-rights movement will presumably stand for the kinds of economic development, urban renewal and social welfare which benefit all Southerners. Just as during Reconstruction the freedmen were far readier to grant the vote to whites than were ex-Confederates to welcome Negro suffrage, so today the Southern freedom movement must be careful to concern itself with the blighting poverty of the poor white as well as with his Negro counterpart. Thus in politics, as well as in direct action, the movement can fulfill Dr. King's prophetic assertion that its mission is to lift the burden of segregation from black and white.

Abolitionists required the Mexican War and the Fugitive Slave Law to keep their spirits pure and their movement independent. Perhaps, so long as the party of Kennedy remains the party of Talmadge, Patterson and Eastland, we need not fear for the soul of the American civil-rights movement as it goes into politics. A good first step would be to run independent candidates at a local level, which the peace movement is already doing.

---

SUMMER CAMPS REVISITED . . by Hermine G. Basnight

THIS JUNE approximately 750,000 old footlockers were hauled out of basements all along the Eastern Seaboard, dusted off and stuffed with uniforms and equipment costing about $100 per locker; 9 million name tapes were somehow sewn or ironed on 9 million socks, and 750,000 children were tearfully (though not without a few signs of relief) kissed good-by at railroad stations and airline terminals—all in answer to the call of that perennial Pied Piper of contemporary America, the private summer camp.

Time was when the only reason to send a child to summer camp was a humane one: to get him off the hot New York City (or Boston or Philadelphia or New Haven) streets. Today camping, like everything else, is more complicated. The seemingly limitless ingenuity of camp directors has transformed camping into a sprawling, highly competitive, half-billion-dollar-a-year industry. Since World War II, camps, like other status symbols of an affluent economy, have mushroomed everywhere.

As near as anyone can figure out, 15,500 camps are accommodating 5.5 million kids throughout the United States this summer. Of these, 9,000 are agency and institutional camps serving 3.25 million children; 3,000 are day, school and church camps which cater to 1.5 million campers; and 3,500 private camps for the aforementioned 750,000. There are 500,000 counselors to keep an eye on the children. Add to this the medical, maintenance and kitchen personnel, and the figures climb even higher.

It all started about one hundred years ago when a New England schoolmaster took some boys out overnight for "an experience in outdoor living." But long gone are the days when a canvas tent or simple wooden cabin housed a hardy race of athletic, energetic campers from six to nineteen. Today's campers range from three to fourteen, with teen-agers given special consideration.

In the old days, camp was a potpourri of active sports (baseball, tennis, track, archery, volleyball, basketball, hiking, swimming, canoeing, life-saving) and fledgling cultural pursuits (dramatics, tap dancing, arts and crafts, nature study). The most exotic we got was "rifle-range practice," a euphemism for belly-flopping on old mattresses deep in the woods and shooting at Dr. Brown's Celery Tonic bottles. From dawn until dark we chorused songs, songs and more songs.

Yet with all the activities there was always plenty of time for staring at dragon flies, water beetles and June bugs, for listening to rain on the cabin roof. A daily rest hour was spent on blankets under the trees.

Other things I remember: listless girls applying calamine lotion to their poison ivy; the delicious round of three wholesome squares a day; miles of crepe paper; bathing caps; collapsible aluminum cups; flashlights; sweaters tied around the waist; tincture of green soap (for shampoos) dispensed by the camp Mother; nightly medical inspection (choice of mineral oil or milk of magnesia); cheery directors and counselors whom we called Uncle and Aunt and whom we adored.

The coeducational camp was unknown. In those days there was strict segregation of the sexes and the twain met en masse perhaps once a summer, for some discreet musicale. Siblings, of course, were brought together weekly if they attended nearby Brother and Sister camps. ("Did you bring my share of the Indian nuts?")

Camp was something else to me. It was there that I had my first intimations of Other Places, there that I first heard the lilting strains of a Brooklyn accent, the broad A of my New Haven bunkies, the charming drawl of an occasional counselor from the South. Slowly it

---

HERMINE G. BASNIGHT, daughter of a camp owner, spent her first twenty-one summers in camp as camper or counselor.

Suffrage - Anti 5-62

Harper's MAGAZINE

THE KENNEDYS MOVE IN ON DIXIE

LOUIS E. LOMAX

How the two brothers are planning to change the whole political climate of the South, by opening the ballot boxes to hundreds of thousands of Negroes.

ALTHOUGH the public is scarcely aware of it, the Kennedy Administration is now deeply involved in an unprecedented campaign to get hundreds of thousands of Southern Negroes to vote for the first time in their lives.

If successful, this plan will also advance those very civil rights which some of the President's critics accuse him of neglecting—in such fields as schools, housing, and jobs. And, not least important, it will help rivet the Negroes' loyalty to the Democratic party for a long while to come.

The campaign in the South, which is now quietly moving into its second year, is actually a pincers movement: One jaw consists of the Justice Department's legal action in cases of infringement of voting rights. The other is a mass drive to teach Negroes to register—and vote—a drive to be led by the major Negro civil rights organizations and to be financed by substantial grants from private foundations in the North.

The depth of the Kennedys' involvement in the campaign for Negroes' voting rights may come as a surprise to some civil rights enthusiasts. Early in his Administration the President let it be known that he considered disfranchisement the crux of the Southern Negro's affliction. To start its attack, the Justice Department filed fourteen new cases charging racial discrimination by various county registrars in five states of the Deep South; and by December 1961 it was making investigations in sixty-one other counties. These cases were pacesetters—pleadings which, when they are settled, will admit thousands of Negroes to the polls. And to protect these potential Negro voters, the Justice Department has successfully prosecuted two suits which affirmed the government's right to act swiftly, and on its own initiative, in behalf of Negro voters facing economic or physical reprisals.

The private civil rights organizations began to get into the act during the spring of 1961. Negro leaders were approached individually by white liberals who assured them that money could be raised if the various civil rights organizations would work together. The chief spokesman was the prominent New York lawyer, Lloyd Garrison. Listening to the proposal, several Negro leaders became convinced that the sponsors were unofficial emissaries from the White House. After several rounds of individual talks, when a consensus seemed to be reached, the Negro leaders were invited to a joint meeting where Mr. Garrison made the presentation; the core of his argument was that voter registration is the place where the most substantial Negro gains can be made with bold government support. This, of course, is the Kennedy Administration's position, and the reasoning supporting it is cold political fact:

(1) Voter registration is the area where the Justice Department has the most power; it can move swiftly, and, if need be, on its own motion. (This power was guaranteed by the civil rights bill passed in 1957.)

(2) Voter registration is the one civil rights item white supremacists cannot afford to oppose publicly, for the right to vote is basic to the American system of government.

(3) Negroes have the most difficulty in areas where their numerical strength poses a political threat. If these Negroes voted, they could help to elect better local officials. This, in the Administration view, would be the critical step toward general civil rights advancement.

(4) A major increase in the number of Southern Negro voters would not only change things at home but would change the complexion of Congress; Southern reactionaries would either mend their ways or run the risk of being voted out of office. Then, and only then, could the Administration get its liberal legislation, including civil rights, through Congress.

(5) Finally, the program is the Administration's most convincing answer to those critics who charge that the President is falling down on his 1960 pledges.

The civil rights leaders with whom this program was discussed were Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, Thurgood Marshall of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Whitney Young, the new executive director of the Urban League, Edward King of the Student Non-violent Co-ordinating Committee, Dr. Martin Luther King of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, James Farmer of CORE, and Leslie Dunbar of the Southern Regional Council. Some suspected that the move was an attempt to siphon off support for the sit-ins and freedom rides, and this fear increased when Attorney General Robert Kennedy called for a "cooling off" period last May lest innocent persons be hurt during the Montgomery to Jackson bus ride.* But friends of the President pointed out that the voter registration program would, in fact, aid these efforts by making it possible for the money then being spent for voter registration to be diverted to other purposes such as mass demonstrations at restaurants and bus terminals.

The next hurdle—disagreement among the Negro leadership groups on just who would do what, who would get how much, and how they would arrange to stay out of each other's hair—was overcome by a proposal that the Southern Regional Council act as administrator for the money. This is an organization based in the South that relies upon moral suasion and accurate research to bring on racial harmony; consequently it is not involved in the fierce competition that has enveloped Negro leadership organizations since the sit-ins.

Much to the surprise of all concerned, the Urban League was the first to agree to the plan. (The Urban League, which considered itself a "social agency," has been in partial eclipse for the past several years because it refused to enter into any kind of controversial activity. Its "new image" is due to the appointment of Whitney Young, a militant liberal and former Dean of the School of Social Work at Atlanta University, as executive secretary.)

After the Urban League came the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE), Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the student organizations, and, after a long delay that almost wrecked the program, the NAACP. (The NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund could not participate because it is restricted under tax regulations to legal activities.)

The Taconic Foundation, a Delaware corporation with offices in New York, has promised a grant of a quarter-million dollars for the educational purposes of the drive; the Field Foundation, $75,000; and others may come in soon. (The Taconic Foundation, started in 1958, is headed by Stephen R. Currier; Lloyd Garrison is its attorney.) The mechanics of the program are complex, but in essence they boil down to this: The Southern Regional Council will act as general supervisor, but the grant will go to the

* This is the Administration's explanation. However, many liberals, including the author, felt that the Attorney General sought a slack-off of the freedom rides lest mob demonstrations embarrass the President, who was then on an overseas mission.

Louis E. Lomax's first book, "The Reluctant African," won the Anisfield-Wolf Award for 1961, and his recent television documentary, "Walk in My Shoes" (he was its co-producer for ABC), won the Thomas A. Edison Award. His new book will be "The Negro Revolt"—to be published by Harper & Brothers in June.

Voter Education Program, a newly formed agency with offices a few feet down the hall from the Southern Regional Council on Forsyth Street in Atlanta. A Negro lawyer, Wiley Branton of Pine Bluff, Arkansas (the man who made headlines as attorney for the nine Negro students in Little Rock), has moved to Atlanta to head the project.

So the stage is set for President Kennedy to fight the civil rights battle of his preference on grounds of his own choosing. Although the Justice Department has appeared as a friend of the court in behalf of the freedom riders and sit-in demonstrators, the Administration does not feel these things are of basic importance. Five hundred Negroes going to jail for the right to sit in a Jackson, Mississippi, airport restaurant is more than a dramatic gesture, and the Administration is willing to help them. But this is not the script it likes best.

A SCRIPT FOR JACKSON

A MORE significant civil rights drama—if I may take the liberty of a fantasy—would open with five thousand Negroes singing and praying as they march toward the voter registration office in Jackson, Mississippi. Martin Luther King, Roy Wilkins, James Farmer, and Whitney Young would march, pray, and sing with them, as they round the bend from "colored town" and head down Jackson's main street toward City Hall. At the registration office, we see the white officials peeping horrified out of the windows, slamming shut the door, and hanging up a sign reading "Closed until further notice, which won't be no time soon."

As the curtain descends, the Negro marchers kneel; one prays while the multitude sing softly, "Like a tree planted by the waters, I shall not be moved."

My script of Act II calls for Attorney General Robert Kennedy to speed to City Hall by limousine from the Jackson airport, to persuade the white officials into their senses by argument and federal injunction, and to deputize his Assistant Attorney General for civil rights, Burke Marshall, to restrain the more extreme local segregationists (such as the Ku Klux Klan and White Citizens Council). As the curtain descends, the Negroes are parading to the polls.

Act II is rather hard to stage, but Act III is a simple dialogue between two Southern Senators on Capitol Hill:

First Senator: "By God, niggers are voting in my state."

Second Senator: "Hell, they are a-voting in mine too; and furthermore, they ain't niggers, they are colored citizens."

The fantasy is mine, but it by no means exaggerates the results which the Kennedy Administration hopes to attain. I believe the hope is a practical one, for this reason: If the present pincers movement were an entirely outside affair, I am sure it would fail. It happens, however, to coincide with spontaneous local political action by Negroes in the South. Brave and resourceful men and women are already planting essential grass-roots support.

For example, this is what is actually going on in Mississippi:

For the first time since Reconstruction, two Negroes are making a serious bid for Congressional seats. One of them is Reverend R. L. T. Smith of Jackson, who seeks to defeat the incumbent, arch-segregationist John Bell Williams; the other is Reverend Theodore Trammell, of Clarksdale.* Trammell's district is, by population, predominantly Negro, yet it includes such counties as Walthall and Tallahatchie where no Negroes have voted since the turn of the century. It also includes Coahoma County (Clarksdale) where race relations are excellent, by Mississippi standards. The Reverend Smith's district was almost 50 per cent Negro when he announced. It has since been enlarged to include the "white" suburbs of Jackson, thus reducing the Negro voter potential to about 35 per cent.

When the Reverends Smith and Trammell announced their candidacies—Trammell is Methodist, Smith is Baptist—their prospects were so slim as to make the attempt almost bizarre. This is why:

- To vote in Mississippi one must prove he has paid his poll tax—two dollars in Smith's district, three dollars in Trammell's—two years in a row unless he has just reached the voting eligibility age of twenty-one, in which case he must present one poll-tax receipt and an exemption certificate. (Four other Southern states—Alabama, Arkansas, Texas, and Virginia—have poll taxes.)
- After he pays his poll tax, he must pass a "literacy test" consisting of an examination of twenty-one questions, one of which requires that the potential voter interpret any section or all of the thirty-page Mississippi constitution.
- Although Mississippi has almost a million Negroes only 60,000 are registered voters.

* As this article went to press, news came that the Reverend Trammell died of a heart attack on March 17. No one was immediately named to take up his candidacy.

• The Mississippi Negro intellectuals who could organize a Negro voter registration program are sidelined because the bulk of them work for the state as schoolteachers and would risk their jobs by getting involved.

• The Negro masses in Mississippi, as they do everywhere, work for white people. And, according to the legend, they are afraid to register and vote.

• Even putting aside the social and psychological factors, Negro candidates are doomed until Congress passes legislation regulating poll taxes and literacy tests. Yet, like the bumblebee who flies in ignorance of the laws of aerodynamics which say his wingspread is too short, Smith and Trammell have taken to the stump in the bayous, with amazing results.

By early March, they had raised a $25,000 campaign kitty, some of it from "private" white audiences who invited them to speak. Reverend Smith has bought time on one of Jackson's TV stations and stated his campaign platform. The other station refused and he is now asking the Federal Communications Commission to force it to sell him time. Neither candidate has been pressured. Both told me they have received crank calls but neither took them seriously. Both said that federal legal actions to protect voting rights have shaken white Mississippians into some hesitancy about their usual capers at the voting booth, for fear, in Reverend Smith's words, "that the Justice Department will come down upon them as the plagues of God did upon the Egyptians."

Nevertheless, the odds are still against the Reverends Smith and Trammell. Their first goal is to get on the ballot for the "white" Democratic primary now scheduled for early June. But the Negro candidates' battle plan is chiefly to draw enough primary votes to force a runoff.

Another Mississippi Negro working effectively to educate Negroes for registration is Dr. Arline Young, a Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania who is now a professor of zoology at Jackson State College. She has put her job on the chopping block by organizing voter registration schools in Jackson, but so far she has neither been threatened by state officials nor been rebuked by the Negro president of the state-supported college.

On the day Dr. Young talked to me she had to cut the conversation short. Four of her voter registration pupils—all Negro women over forty—had attempted to register but were turned back when the registrar politely explained, "We ran out of registration forms and had to order new ones. They have just come in but the ink on them is not dry yet." Dr. Young was on her way to the registration office with the four women and was confident that "the ink will be dry by the time I get there."

Alabama Negroes are also on the move. Two Birmingham Negroes are assured of seats on the 144-member Jefferson County Democratic party steering committee, as the result of a federal district court ruling on March 23 that they must be allowed to run in the "white" primary. Eight other Negroes are running against white candidates for steering committee seats—five of them from predominantly Negro districts.

JUSTICE KEEPS TRACK

THESE courageous few, acting on their own, and with only silent and scattered support from local white sympathizers, have set modest goals. But their action, as seen from Washington, is much more important than electing one or two good Congressmen—refreshing as that outcome might be. The Department of Justice is not blind in this field; it is gathering information on the potential Negro vote throughout the South and it has practical plans to make that vote a reality. The following statistics suggest the political scope of the Negro registration drive. (The percentages refer to adults of voting age, Negro or white.)

Negroes comprise 40 per cent of the voting potential in seven of Alabama's nine Congressional Districts.

Among Mississippi's six Congressional Districts, Negroes are 50 per cent in four districts; 32 per cent in one; 23 per cent in one.

South Carolina has six Congressional Districts: Negroes are more than 40 per cent in two of them, 35 per cent in two others, and more than 20 per cent in the remaining two.

Negroes are 33 per cent of the potential voters in six of Georgia's ten Congressional Districts.

They are at least 25 per cent in all eight of Louisiana's Congressional Districts, and are more than 40 per cent in one.

When these Congressional District figures are broken down to city and county levels, the balance, in favor of Negroes, is even more impressive. Mississippi, for example, has eighty-two counties: among adults, Negroes predominate in eighteen of these counties; five counties are about evenly balanced. Marengo County, Alabama, is a striking—though not unique—case of Negro voter potential: it has 8,000 voting-age Negroes, 7,000 adult white people. But 5,000 white adults are registered voters as against only 139 Negroes.

So, throughout the Deep South, the story runs. And it is the theory of the Kennedy Administration that once these Negroes gain the franchise they can change conditions at home and in Washington. But how will the scheme which looks so good on paper and in statistics work out in practice?

"It's already working," Assistant Attorney General Marshall told me. "We have been working closely with the Negroes in Macon County [Alabama] and Fayette and Haywood Counties [Tennessee] and changes are already in the making. We have gone to court to see to it that these Negroes are allowed to register without reprisals. We won and they are registering."

I reminded Burke Marshall that Negroes in the South hesitate to run the risk of voting when the choice is between two equally abusive white candidates. "We expect our voter registration efforts not only to produce better white candidates for Negroes to choose from," he replied, "but we fully expect to have Negro candidates emerge."

Only time can say how all this will work out, but the Administration is fully convinced that it is on the right track. What it fears most at this juncture—and, I think, correctly—is that the Negro leadership organizations, either because of bickering among themselves or lack of contact with the Negro masses, will fail to draw out large numbers of potential Negro voters. For this reason the voter registration grant by the foundations is not limited to the established Negro organizations. Any group interested in voter education may apply, and I predict that if the established organizations seem to be falling short, a number of local organizations—such as the Montgomery, Alabama, and Albany, Georgia, movements—will obtain grants from the Voter Education Program for its specific purposes. Two promising groups are the citizens in Clarksdale, Mississippi, who have put several thousand Negroes on the registration books in the last twelve months and the Co-ordinating Voters Committee in Jackson, Mississippi, which Dr. Young heads. These are grass-roots movements and they seem to be closer to the Kennedy view than the overstructured Negro leadership organizations are. For example, I interviewed Attorney General Robert Kennedy and Dr. Arline Young. Here is what each one said:

Dr. Young: "We have three problems down here: Many Negroes are lethargic about voting but the appearance of two Negroes as Congressional candidates has done a good deal to help eliminate that. The other two problems we face are the poll tax and the literacy tests. We can raise the money and help Negroes pay the poll tax but the literacy test is beyond us. Many of the students who come to my voter registration schools fail the registration test because they cannot interpret the Mississippi State Constitution to suit the white officials. If we could just get rid of that literacy test we could really do wonders down here."

Attorney General Robert Kennedy: "I can say to you that we are quite determined about getting Congressional action that will eliminate the poll tax and literacy test as prerequisites for voting. We have already moved through the courts to strike down the literacy test in Louisiana. Our position is known, and we plan to make a major effort on Capitol Hill for legislation in this area." (The Department is also preparing a case on the literacy test in Mississippi.)

This January Majority Leader Mike Mansfield introduced in the Senate a bill drafted in his office and in the Justice Department that would standardize voting literacy tests. Based upon the report of the President's Commission on Civil Rights, the bill would admit any citizen who has completed sixth grade, in English or Spanish, to the polls. Minority Leader Everett Dirksen cut short a speaking tour in Illinois and returned to Washington to act as co-sponsor of the bill. The measure went before the Senate Judiciary Committee headed by Mississippi Senator James Eastland—the unfortunate fate of most civil rights bills. However Mansfield has served notice that he will move to bring the bill out of committee if the group has not acted by May first. The Administration also wants action abolishing poll taxes in elections of federal officials, and Senator Spessard Holland is sponsoring a Constitutional amendment for that purpose. This is a slow method, requiring both Congressional passage and ratification by the states, but this spring it seemed to have a chance, for it passed in the Senate. (The Administration's literacy bill, however, appeared likely to founder on debate of the issue of constitutionality.)

THE PRESIDENT'S SCORE

WHATEVER the merits and success of the President's voting scheme, the Administration will continue to be under attack from Negro leaders for failure to take certain Executive actions and support a variety of civil rights bills. The criticism of the President will become a national issue when the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights (a committee composed of the heads of all civil rights organizations, Negro and Jewish) stages a march on Washington late this spring to protest against what they call "a retreat from the civil rights plank in the 1960 Democratic platform."

The Negro leaders want the President to go all out for legislation that would establish a Permanent Fair Employment Practice Committee; they want an act of Congress making school desegregation the law of the land; they want the restoration of Part III of the 1957 Civil Rights bill. (This section of the bill was deleted because of Southern opposition; it would empower the Attorney General to move on all civil rights issues, and to move on his own motion. This would remove the onus from embattled Southern Negroes, many of whom are afraid to file complaints against white persons who abuse them.)

In terms of Executive action, the Negro leaders want mainly (1) an order striking down segregation in federally aided housing and (2) enforcement of an existing order calling for the end of discrimination by private companies handling government contracts.

These are the same demands the civil rights leaders made of the President early in the summer of 1961. The President gave them a cordial audience at that time; he told them he understood that the very nature of their jobs made it necessary that they keep him under continuing pressure. But his reply to their demands was "No, not now." Then the President went on to state his conviction that voter registration was the better civil rights course for him to follow.

Despite the mounting criticism from liberals, the President's civil rights position has not shifted. Mr. Kennedy is even more certain now than he was last year that by election time—1962 and 1964—he will have more sway with the liberal voters, including Negroes, than his critics will. There are several reasons for confidence:

First, Kennedy has appointed more Negroes to top federal jobs than any President in history. The Assistant White House Press Officer is a Negro; so is an Assistant Secretary of State and an Assistant Secretary of Labor. The nation's housing boss not only is a Negro but is a former chairman of the executive board of the NAACP. This Administration has appointed two Negroes as United States Attorneys, the first in history, and has broken precedent again by naming two Negroes to federal district judgeships. The number of Negro attorneys in the Department of Justice—chosen solely for quality, not for color—has increased fivefold, from ten to fifty, since Mr. Kennedy took office and his brother took over the Justice Department.

All this didn't "just grow." The Deans of fifty law schools are now on the scout for promising Negro students, at the request of the Administration. For the first time in history, the Department of Justice will have a number of Negro law applicants on file for jobs.

Second, Southern rural Negroes are now leaving the South and so are voting with their feet. Upwards of a million Negroes went North in the decade of the 'fifties. Less than 20 per cent of the nation's nineteen million Negroes now live in rural areas, and, as of 1960, over 50 per cent were living outside the Southeastern states.

This Negro migration—the greatest going on anywhere in the world—works for the Kennedy Administration. Once Negroes move to urban areas, even in the South, they have less difficulty at the polls and, on the whole, vote Democratic (68 per cent of the Negro voters voted for Mr. Kennedy in 1960 as against only 49 per cent of the white voters). Also, the Negro voter—job discrimination being what it is—embraces a political philosophy which meshes precisely with the legislative program Kennedy is attempting to get through Congress over the opposition of Southern reactionaries and conservative Republicans. Needless to say, urban and non-Southern Negroes will be deeply impressed by the Kennedy voter registration drive once it gets under way. The plan will not make much of a dent upon the South for another year or two, but the publicity that is sure to arise from the registration of thousands of Southern Negroes will cause their Northern brothers to vote Democratic in larger numbers than ever.

Third, there is not a Republican on the horizon who can match the Administration's civil rights record. Governor Rockefeller has an emotional appeal to many middle-class Negroes who have graduated from Negro colleges supported by Rockefeller money, but his civil rights record in New York has been without luster. Hence his denunciation of Kennedy's "record of broken promises" is relatively ineffective. Richard Nixon has yet to explain why he didn't try to get Martin Luther King out of jail on the eve of the 1960 elections (Kennedy did intervene, and, according to his biographers, the phone call in Dr. King's behalf swayed the nation's Negro voters and, thus, the election). Senator Barry Goldwater has openly advised his party to forget about the Negro vote. That means that Negroes will forget about him should he get the GOP nomination. And if the Republicans hitch their wagon to George Romney's rising political star they are indeed in for a shock. For Romney, now a candidate for the Michigan GOP gubernatorial nomination, is an elder in the Mormon Church and must somehow explain to Negro voters how he can embrace a faith that bars Negroes from its priesthood.

"A STROKE OF THE PEN"

NO doubt, John F. Kennedy stands well with the Negro voters. Even so the President must answer to the people and to his own sense of commitment, as his biographer James MacGregor Burns calls it, for his failure to issue the much discussed Executive order ending discrimination in federally aided housing. Mr. Kennedy himself helped heat the coals that are now being heaped upon his head when in 1960 he said the Republicans were insincere about civil rights because they refused to issue such an order. "This," said the then Senator Kennedy, "the President [Mr. Eisenhower] could do with a stroke of his pen." The order has been on Mr. Kennedy's desk for over a year now, and he has yet to make that critical stroke with his pen.

"The argument is not over if we are going to issue the order," Louis E. Martin of the Democratic National Committee, and a Negro, told me, "the question is when we are going to do it."

Behind this delay lies a typical Kennedy operation. The Administration had hoped to have the confirmation of Dr. Robert C. Weaver, a Negro, as head of the proposed new Urban Affairs Department signed and delivered before the order was issued. (This would allow the South time to swallow one pill before another was offered.) When the agency was defeated in Congress this February, the question of a Negro in the Cabinet was no longer a factor affecting the housing order. (However, the Weaver affair did win the President additional favor with Negro voters; every major Negro newspaper praised the President for the attempt.) The Administration's stated reason for the delay, as of now, is to give the Administration time to do some house cleaning in the housing bureau itself.

"We would rather face the voters in 1962 and have the liberals say we didn't issue the order," one of the President's advisers told me, "than to say we issued it and couldn't make our own people carry it out." To protect themselves against just this, the Administration has organized a number of pressure moves, mostly political and in both the South and the North, to propel reluctant local housing officials in the right direction once the order is given. Undoubtedly, also, the Administration is giving prior consideration to passage of its tariff legislation.

As for the order itself, it will be issued—possibly by summer, almost certainly by the November elections. It will probably contain a Kennedy twist: a provision to strike down discrimination in the unions supplying workers on such housing. (The construction crafts unions are still lily-white even in the North.) Thus the order, as now envisioned, will not only open all federally aided housing to Negroes but will provide some of them with jobs so that they can pay their rent.

Clearly, then, much of the liberal criticism of the President can be reduced to a matter of timing. As the full implications of the Kennedy drive to register Negro voters in the South and other civil rights moves become clear, the question to be argued will be why he took so long. And once again it will be Mr. Kennedy's own words by which he will be weighed. He was a candidate on September 9, 1960, in Los Angeles, when he said: The President "cannot wait for others to act. He himself must draft the programs, transmit them to Congress and fight for their enactment, taking his case to the people if the Congress is slow."

This the President has not done. His delay, I am convinced, is a necessary concomitant of political mechanics: the awesome task of moving Congress (a Congress where he has no real majority backing), of rallying private support, of changing, legally, the political and economic situation of the Negroes in the South and wherever they are discriminated against. He got into the Presidency by political maneuvering—the only way he could have got there—and he cannot afford an absolutely moralistic attitude on any single issue, particularly one so explosive as civil rights. It is true: he has not kept all of his promises by time clock. But he has a strong defense—part of which is the massive and necessarily slow voter registration drive.

There are, of course, some men who would have elected a different course than that decided upon by President Kennedy. Like Isaiah, they would thunder for all to hear and, they hope, tremble. But in practical terms—the things men eat, vote, and pay rent by—would these moralists accomplish as much as the complex and burdened man from Boston is now achieving?

Frankly, I doubt it.

Suffrage, So. 1962

and the Interstate Commerce Commission almost invariably goes along.

The President's proposals to spend $500 million, in 3 years, to help solve the problem of urban mass transportation found eager assistance on Capitol Hill. Senator HARRISON WILLIAMS, Democrat, of New Jersey, long has been plugging for such a program and there's a good chance that hearings will be held on his legislation, providing essentials for what the President asked in this limited field.

All in all, the message did little to presage massive changes in the status quo. If it is implemented by Congress, it will be a plus for the railroads, but will not be considered the open sesame to solve the many pressing problems of the industry.

J.F.K. also gave what was considered to be unqualified endorsement to the recent report of his Presidential Railroad Commission, which urged abolishment of featherbedding jobs through the Nation's rail system, although protecting the income of most of the existing work force.

The President renewed his earlier request for repeal of the 10-percent excise on passenger tickets. There's a good chance that Congress will act on this subject, this session.

Among secondary recommendations, the President proposed:

1. Prohibiting railroads from barring or charging discriminatory rates to carry truck trailers, or piggybacking; 2, permitting railroads to carry coal, oil or other commodities from their own holdings for sale to outsiders; 3, directing the regulatory agencies to allow the setting of experimental rates and modification or combination of existing rate classes.

Daniel Loomis, president of the Association of American Railroads, headquartered here, declared that the President's proposals "will go a long way in helping to develop a sound, overall transportation system."

KEFAUVER MOVES TO PREVENT HASTY MERGERS

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER, Democrat, of Tennessee, who has become the Nation's No. 1 trustbuster as chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, has turned on the steam in his drive to halt major rail mergers.

In early February, the Tennessee solon delivered a long, well-researched speech suggesting that such mergers be held up. In early April, he delivered a slightly heavier blow by introducing S. 3097, which, if enacted, would bar the Interstate Commerce Commission from approving any of the gigantic merger proposals now pending until December 31, 1963. His powerful cosigners of the new bill included Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, Democrat, of Montana, Senate majority leader; Senator LEE METCALF, Democraft, of Montana, and some seven other well-known solons.

In a speech introducing the bill—which well may take precedence in Capitol Hill discussions over the President's own transportation message—Senator KEFAUVER called for a broad Senate merger probe. J.F.K. has said he was setting up an interagency committee in order to furnish broader criteria to regulatory agencies (notably the ICC and the Civil Aeronautics Board), in ruling on mergers.

"Time is running out," Senator KEFAUVER told his colleagues. "Some very large and very important rail merger proposals before the Interstate Commerce Commission have finished with their hearings or are nearing completion.

"The Seaboard-Atlantic Coast Line merger application is awaiting momentarily the examiner's decision. Since the Southern recently received the examiner's approval for its control over the Central of Georgia, any further opposition by it to the Seaboard-Atlantic Coast Line union may well blow away, especially as the Southern now seeks to acquire the Georgia & Florida. The Southern Pacific's fight with the Santa Fe over control of the Western Pacific also has been concluded. Hearings have started on the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, and Burlington merger proposal. It is expected that they will be completed by June.

"The hearings on the Chesapeake & Ohio's petition for control of the B. & O. are over. The major opponent, the New York Central, withdrew from that case the day it announced its proposed merger with the Pennsylvania. The Norfolk & Western, Nickel Plate, Wabash proceedings started last December and have been moving rapidly since the New York Central withdrew its opposition, again on the day it announced the merger with the Pennsylvania. Meantime, hearings are developing in a game of musical chairs involving the Louisville & Nashville—which is controlled by the Atlantic Coast Line—the Illinois Central, the Missouri Pacific, the Chicago & Eastern Illinois and other roads in the Midwest and in the South.

"Thus, time is very much the essence. The records, such as they are, are being made and the cases are becoming closed. Action to halt this movement, pending a full investigation, must be taken in this session of Congress * * *."

The bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Commerce, but no word of hasty action has been heard from Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON, Democrat, of Washington, chairman, who usually does not rush into action without lots of prodding.

Labor unions—if that's any news—are fighting mergers tooth and nail. They have lined up solidly behind the Kefauver bill and just might be able to swing enough weight in this election year to get some action on it in the Senate.

---

Civil Rights Legislation and the Filibuster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 6, 1962

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on the day following the collapse in the Senate of the attempt to secure a vote on the administration's literacy test bill, the noted ABC Commentator Edward P. Morgan broadcast a cogent analysis of this latest defeat for the Nation at the hands of the filibuster.

Mr. Morgan's comments deserve wide attention, for they put the challenge squarely to the Senate, along the lines of the fine Senate speech by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Is the Senate of the United States at least an equal and coodinate part of a 20th century Congress, or is the Senate "letting the world pass it by" under obsolete procedures of a previous century?

I ask unanimous consent that the transcript of Mr. Morgan's broadcast of May 16, 1962, be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION AND THE FILIBUSTER

The Senate buried civil rights legislation yesterday for this session of Congress and the ceremony demonstrated how time has passed the august body by. More civil rights legislation is needed but Southern obstructionists, seemingly unmindful of what is going on around them, blocked a bill which would have made it harder to deny Negroes their constitutional right to vote. That, however, is only part of the story. Another illuminating part is that nobody pushed the measure very vigorously and nobody has even substantially mourned its demise. What, then, happened and why?

One of the surest ways that Negroes can be freed from the bondage of second-class citizenship is to make it possible for them to vote, which particularly the Southern Negro population has been unable to do despite constitutional guarantees of that basic right. Official reports of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission have demonstrated irrefutably how Negroes are systematically disenfranchised in 100 counties in 8 Southern States by the blatant abuse of literacy tests. College graduates, for example, have not been allowed to register because they slipped up in a sentence or a punctuation mark in reciting from the Federal Constitution or some other official document. The thrust of the administration bill was to check this abuse by entitling anybody with a sixth-grade education to vote, if otherwise qualified.

Senate Majority Leader MIKE MANSFIELD thought this was vital legislation which would open the polls to countless thousands of Negroes. But nobody got aroused about it, much. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People made no burning statement in support of it. ADA, Americans for Democratic Action, with a long and admirable history of fighting for civil rights, even indicated the measure was of piffling importance.

Pressures did not build up on Congress. Senator JOSEPH CLARK, a liberal Democrat from Pennsylvania, estimated he received at least 26,000 pieces of mail, much of it motivated by the savings and loan lobby, on the move to collect revenue on dividends and interest via the withholding tax. But he got less than 26 letters on the literacy test bill. Other Senators' experiences were similar.

Then came the first vote, a week ago today, to apply cloture and shut off the Southern filibuster, unrobust as it was, delaying a vote on the civil rights bill. The more needed a two-thirds majority and it didn't even get a simple majority. It failed, 53 to 43. But then the Senate turned right around and voted 64 to 33 not to table the legislation. This showed that if it hadn't been for the refusal to invoke cloture, a majority would have passed the bill. Then Monday a second cloture move failed, 52 to 42, and the bill was dead.

Who was kidding whom? One fact is that the southerners can count on nonsouthern support for the filibuster. This is partly due to past political deals; for example Alaska statehood was finally realized reportedly in return for a pledge not to vote for cloture. Some other Western States, despite the fact that each has exactly the same number of votes in the Senate as the most populous eastern State, seem to have developed a psychological block about the filibuster, as if they didn't dare to oppose it on civil rights for fear they might not be able to use it themselves for other purposes.

In a kind of funeral oration on the Senate's action, Senator CLARK observed yesterday that it was "an old captivity of ours" to be unwilling to violate tradition by imposing a limitation on debate although the Senate "knew it was ready for action and the majority wanted to act."

He urged his colleagues to "look into our hearts to see whether we in this body are not operating under a great delusion * * * that we are not a part of the world today * * * that in this air-conditioned chamber, filled with genial friends, we can, in a sense, let the rest of the world go by while we continue to operate under procedures which were obsolete before the end of the 19th century."

The fact that the Senate is letting the world pass it by explains, in part, why liberals and liberal groups did not push the bill—especially since the executive branch is continuing to take direct action. Sixty-four suits have already been filed on behalf of Negroes denied their voting rights in 64 counties of 8 Southern States.

Other figures speak even more impressively. Democratic Party registration drives have just been completed among Negro voters in major Southern cities. Here are some of the unofficial results: In Houston, with 119,000 Negroes of voting age, more than half—70,000—are now registered; Fort Worth 14,000; Dallas 34,000; Memphis 82,000; New Orleans 35,000; Atlanta 42,000; Miami 31,000. In a close election in any of these cities, these Negro voters could swing it.

Some Senators would argue this is proof more legislation is not needed. What it proves is how aloof from reality the Senate has made itself and how chagrined it should be that it is hindering instead of helping the exciting process in which the American Negro is claiming first-class citizenship.

King-Anderson Not the Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANCHER NELSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 6, 1962

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, typical of the comments from letter writers and editors in the Second District of Minnesota is the analysis of the King-Anderson bill by Russell Bowers of the Westbrook Sentinel of Westbrook, Minn. Under unanimous consent, I place the editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

KING-ANDERSON NOT THE ANSWER

Countless thousands of words are being exchanged in our Nation regarding possible merits of the controversial Kennedy-backed King-Anderson health insurance bill for the aged. It may resolve into one of the most bitterly contested measures ever debated by Congress.

Certainly more opinions are being expressed on this proposed bit of legislation than any other for some time.

The bill, which would supposedly provide payment for medical and hospital care for persons over 65 has already caused a split in the ranks of the Democratic supporters of the measure. Many confirmed Demos find themselves opposed to the proposal.

The writer must join the ranks of those persons who do not feel this type of legislation is the answer to whatever problem may exist.

First, in our opinion, this is a compulsory type bill, similar to social security. Whenever it becomes compulsory to subscribe to Government programs you, without question, have Government control. Experience has proven that Government control is definitely second best.

Second, who will benefit? The administration admits that persons over 65 total only 10 percent of this country's population, yet everyone presently paying social security would pay for compulsory health insurance.

Of the 10 percent of our population of persons 65 and over, almost one-third presently have private health insurance, thus cutting down still further the number of needy persons.

Third, it is our opinion the bill would tend to create an inflationary trend in the cost of medical care and possibly an inflationary trend in prices of all commodities in general.

Provisions of the bill call for the employer to also pay part of the cost of the program for each employee, similar to the deductions now made for social security.

If the employer must also pay part of the cost he will, most likely, have to pass along to his customer the extra expense in the form of increased charges for products and services. This, in turn, will cause labor to increase wage demands, all adding to the spiral upward in prices.

It would seem foolhardy to subject this country's entire population to a program, whose cost can only be guessed at, only to benefit a small portion of our people.

Progress Report on Great Lakes Port Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 6, 1962

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, in the next few weeks the Committee on Public Works will receive from the U.S. Corps of Engineers the last of some 40 interim reports recommending improvements on the harbors of the Great Lakes from Duluth, Minn., to Ogdensburg, N.Y. This is part of a program which I had the privilege of initiating in the Committee on Public Works—Public Law 434, 84th Congress, approved March 21, 1956, and committee resolution adopted June 27, 1956—to provide deep-draft harbor improvements and deep-draft connecting channels on the Great Lakes as part of the overall Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway.

The Engineering News-Record of May 31, 1962, carries a comprehensive report of this huge port development program on the Great Lakes and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREAT LAKES PORT DEVELOPMENT WILL TAKE CONSTRUCTION MILLIONS

This summer the Army Corps of Engineers North Central Division will submit the last of about 40 interim reports recommending improvements on harbors on the Great Lakes from Duluth, Minn., to Ogdensburg, N.Y. This will complete the nearly 6-year-old Great Lakes harbors study. Meanwhile, 18 harbor improvements recommended earlier under the program and approved by Congress are scheduled to hit full stride.

The Great Lakes harbors study, authorized in 1956, constitutes a port-by-port blueprint for a 10-year program of dredging, shoal removal, and breakwater construction. It is expected to cost the Government more than $160 million in initial expenditures.

BIG SHIPS FORCE BROAD VIEW

Although improvements on individual Great Lakes harbors have generally been in progress for more than a century, this is the first time harbor improvements have been planned in the context of an overall view of lake traffic and the relationship of each harbor to its neighbors.

The reason for the present program: The increasing size of vessels going into service on interlake traffic and the entry of deep-draft oversea traffic through the St. Lawrence Seaway cause profound changes in Great Lakes traffic patterns.

IT'S NOT ALL FEDERAL

Under terms of the current program, industry and local governments will invest additional millions to take advantage of the basic harbor work. Normally, the Government will sponsor only general navigational improvements, such as channel deepening, breakwaters, and turning basins. Local interests must back up this work with concurrent improvements in docks and cargo facilities.

Although the Federal Government will bear the lion's share of the improvement program, local interests will match or exceed the Government's investment in some instances. Before recommending a project, the Corps of Engineers demands concrete evidence of local willingness to participate.

Local action can vary widely from port to port, but usually includes actual construction of shore facilities, a straight cash contribution, or an industrial expansion. The Corps of Engineers always requires guaranteed rights-of-way and liability protection. For example, at Burns Waterway, Ind., the corps requires construction of a fully integrated steelmill to use the proposed harbor.

SOME CONTRACTS UNDERWAY

Specific recommendations by the Corps of Engineers under the Great Lake harbors study range from a now nearly completed $80,000 deepening project at Two Harbors, Minn., to a still unauthorized $25.5-million plan to create the harbor at Burns Waterway.

Congress so far has appropriated $6.5 million for engineering and actual work on 18 harbor improvements originally authorized in the 1960 Rivers and Harbors Act. The Corps of Engineers has requested $23.2 million more for fiscal 1963 to continue projects underway.

Total cost of this first phase, involving the 18 harbors, is estimated at $79.7 million between now and 1966. Approximately 27.6 million cubic yards of earth and 1.2 million cubic yard of rock will be removed to deepen and extend channels; also involved is one-third of a million square yards of shoal removal.

So far 6 major contracts worth a total of $10.3 million have been let, and nearly a score more, involving work on 11 additional harbors, are scheduled to be advertised and let by year's end. One small harbor project is now nearing completion, with a Government vessel and labor hired by the Corps of Engineers. All bids on that job by contractors were rejected as excessive.

YEAR-TO-YEAR FINANCING

So-called continuing-type contratcs are used on these jobs, as a legal protection for the Government against possible refusal of Congress to appropriate funds for continuation of a project from 1 fiscal year to the next. Since Congress does not normally appropriate money for more than a year at a time.

Thus all contracts have a self-nullification clause that can be invoked in this event. This explains how the Corps of Engineers has been able to let contracts totaling more than $10 million even though Congress has appropriated only $6.5 million to date.

PHASE 2 UP TO THIS CONGRESS

With the first phase of the harbor improvement program set to go into high gear pending action by Congress, a program slating 16 more harbors for improvement is almost ready for presentation to Congress for authorization this session.

Initial construction costs on the second series of harbors are estimated at more than $76 million, with completion scheduled

Suffrage South

6-11-62

NEGRO GOAL: BALANCE OF POWER IN THE SOUTH

In Southern States, an important political force is rising rapidly.

By the thousands, Negroes are enrolling as voters in the South's cities as a result of a quiet but massive campaign.

Supported by outside money, coached by labor's political experts, Southern Negroes are breaking the old barriers, edging toward real power at the polls.

ATLANTA

A political tide that is rising in the South can greatly change the shape of things in the years ahead.

The tide shows in the mounting numbers of Negroes who are registering and qualifying to vote. An organized, well-financed effort, steadily and with little fanfare, is bringing tens of thousands of Negroes into voter-registration and poll-tax offices all across the South.

In the 11 States of the old Confederacy, more than 100,000 names of Negro voters have been added to lists in the last year. The goal is to add at least 500,000 more by 1964. This would bring the total to 2 million for the next presidential election—about 15 per cent of all qualified voters in the 11 States and enough to hold the balance of power in many areas.

Many Southern Negroes long have contended that the first step toward changing laws and attitudes in their region was to get the vote. They reasoned that, if the Negro vote was a decisive factor in winning elections, Southern politicians would bid for that vote. This view is reflected in the present drive.

Money and help. The drive is massive, forceful and well financed. It has the support of the Justice Department, the Kennedy Administration and the labor unions. Almost $500,000 has been provided to finance the work. More money is available when needed. Organization has been perfected. Labor-union tactics are being used.

Under the impact, old barriers that kept Negroes from qualifying are weakening. Negroes are taught to meet literacy tests. Only five poll-tax States remain. In spite of delaying tactics and intimidation by many county registrars and sheriffs, federal officials say there are fewer than 80 "hard core" counties—of 1,107 in the 11 states—where it is almost impossible for a Negro to register.

The campaign was inspired by federal officials who were unhappy about the violence that greeted "Freedom Riders" in bus stations in Alabama and Mississippi in 1961. Three private foundations provided money. Five active Negro organizations came together to help in the work. The Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, headed by prominent white Southerners, directed the activities. It set up as a subsidiary a "voter education" project, headed by a Negro.

As wheels began to turn in May, 1962, planners found problems on two fronts: White Southerners did not relish the idea of a big vote by Negroes. And Negroes themselves seemed not interested in voting. They said it made little difference to them which white man was elected; things went on just the same. This lethargy among Negroes had caused many previous registration drives to fail.

Southern Negroes said they had been threatened with harm if they registered, that they had lost jobs and businesses, that credit had been cut off. Others said their votes would not be counted, that they had tried to register and had failed. Why try again?

Stirring up interest. All sorts of devices were used to stir interest.

"If we have a Negro in the local jail in a civil-rights case, this fires up the Negroes," said one registration worker. "'Freedom Riders' helped us. We shamed Negroes into registering by saying they refused to vote while other Negroes were getting their heads knocked in."

Said another worker: "If we can get a local Negro to run for political office, Negroes will register in droves."

Negro ministers began asking members of their congregations to stand and hold their registration cards above their heads. "This shames those who have no cards," said a registration worker.

From the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education came many ideas. Roy Reuther, who heads up voter-registration work for COPE, lent a hand. Literature, charts, posters from COPE's headquarters in Washington streamed out to registration workers in the South.

Much registration work is done in Southern cities where there is less opposition to Negro voting than in rural areas. Lists of nonregistered Negroes are compiled. Paid workers go after them.

Examples:

- In a Louisiana city, a Negro woman is paid $30 a week, plus a $2 bounty for each Negro name she gets on the registration lists.
- In a Georgia city, a 50-passenger bus was chartered to go through Negro residential areas and take unregistered Negroes to the registrar's office.
- Negro cab drivers are urged to haul passengers to registration offices free.
- Repeated, regular telephone calls are made to urge Negroes to register.
- Negroes ring doorbells in residential areas, learn of people not registered, teach

(continued on page 58)

REGISTRATION TO VOTE by thousands of Negroes across the South is beginning to change the political picture.

Copyright 1962, U. S. News Publishing Corp.

Basic data: Southern Regional Council, U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, and State registrars DRIVE TO ADD at least 500,000 Negro voters by 1964 is well organized, uses labor-union tactics. To overcome apathy that caused earlier drives to fail, leaders of Negro groups such as the NAACP and CORE travel widely to get the attention of prospective voters.

REGISTRATION WORKERS in some Southern cities make house-to-house calls to explain the voter drive. Most are unpaid. But, in one city, a $2 bounty was paid for each new name signed up; in another, a bus was chartered to take Negroes to register.

—USN&WR Photos

—USN&WR Photo

VOTING-DRIVE WORKERS are assigned to specific areas to stir up interest in registration. Some Negroes must be taught to read and write well enough to pass literacy tests.

NEGRO VOTERS IN THE SOUTH, STATE BY STATE

| As of spring, 1962 | Whites Qualified To Vote | Negroes Qualified To Vote | Per Cent of Voters Who Are Negroes |
|---|---|---|---|
| ALABAMA | 884,000 | 68,000 | 7% |
| ARKANSAS | 518,000 | 73,000 | 12% |
| FLORIDA | 1,788,000 | 183,000 | 9% |
| GEORGIA | 1,153,000 | 176,000 | 13% |
| LOUISIANA | 934,000 | 151,000 | 14% |
| NORTH CAROLINA | 1,862,000 | 211,000 | 10% |
| SOUTH CAROLINA | 700,000 | 80,000 | 10% |
| TENNESSEE | 1,465,000 | 185,000 | 11% |
| TEXAS | 2,420,000 | 230,000 | 9% |
| VIRGINIA | 933,000 | 110,000 | 11% |
| TOTAL* | 12,657,000 | 1,467,000 | 10% |

■ WHITES are 80% of the total population of voting age in these Southern States, and account for 90% of the qualified voters.

■ NEGROES are 20% of the total population of voting age, and account for 10% of the qualified voters.

* Comparable data not available for Mississippi. Basic data: Southern Regional Council, U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, and State registrars.

RED, WHITE AND BLUE BUTTON is given to a proud new voter after he has registered. Button reads: "I am registered. Are you?"

[continued from page 56]

them how to fill out forms and register, or how to pay poll taxes. Sometimes poll-tax money is provided.

Study and patience. Older Negroes who do not read or write well are carefully taught. Some try to pass literacy tests, fail and try again. Some never pass the tests, but most of them do. Instruction is patient, thorough both in private and in groups.

"Literacy tests and trick registration forms are just added steps in the process," says one worker. "We overcome them."

In a South Carolina city, a State official counted six whites in a line, waiting to register. There were 150 Negroes in the line.

"The whites did not have the patience to wait," he said. "Most of them left the line. Negroes are used to waiting. They stayed. Most of them registered."

In Atlanta, where there are 45,000 Negroes and 98,000 whites on the voting lists, 6,000 Negroes have registered since the first of the year.

In a Louisiana city, 600 Negroes have registered this year. The registrar says: "We haven't had many people to register recently except Negroes. The whites certainly had better get busy. Ninety per cent of the registered Negroes vote. Only 65 per cent of the whites vote, even in hot election campaigns."

Leaders of Negro organizations are going quietly about their work. They hope the word will not spread through white communities.

"Any publicity gives local registrars in the South a warning," said one. "Many of them immediately set up new obstacles or slow down proceedings. We wish nothing would be said about the drive. Let the registrars go to sleep and then suddenly wake up after a million Negroes are registered."

"The more people we get on the books, the more quiet opposition we run into," said another. "When publicity gets around that we are getting the vote for Negroes, opposition gets tougher."

Negroes complain that they encounter delays, tricky questions, many technicalities. If there is a minor error in an application, they say, the Negro is disqualified. He has to come back and try again.

But the number of qualified Negroes is growing steadily. And some Negro leaders say they can detect a change in the political atmosphere.

"It is common nowadays," said one Negro leader, "for a Southern politician to approach us quietly and very privately. 'Just what do you people want?' they ask. 'What can I do for you?' Some of these same people make the loudest segregation speeches." [END]

July 62 Suffrage Smith

The Southern Negro's Right to Vote

by Charles Steinberg

The right to vote has been found by generations of immigrant Americans to be a key to achieving equality. It is a right which may have to be organized to get results, but it represents both latent and actual power.

The southern Negro represents the largest segment of Americans still without this basic right of a free man. The final step toward winning this right is now under way as the facts are established, as the obstacles are defined and brought under fire and as the Negro continues to fight for his rights.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reported in 1959 that there were 5 million Negroes of voting age in the South at the 1950 census, of whom 1.2 million were registered to vote in the 1956 elections. This, as the report observed, constituted about 25 percent Negro registration, while white registration was 60 percent of the white voting age population.

Outside the South, a Gallup poll survey in another context indicated that 53 percent of the Negro voting age population (including many recent emigrants from the South) was registered to vote.

In its 1961 report the Commission made further attempts to assess the Negro voting problem:

- In 129 counties in 10 southern states where Negroes compose at least 5 percent of the voting age population, less than 10 percent of this ostensibly eligible group is registered.
- In 23 counties in five of these states, no Negroes are registered though there are large Negro registrations in other counties with similar population structure in each of these states.
- In 100 counties in eight states (Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee), there is reason to believe Negro citizens are prevented by outright discrimination—or by fear of physical violence or economic reprisal—from exercising the right to vote.
- In a specific study of "Black Belt" counties the commission found in the 21 counties it examined there existed "substantial deprivations of civil rights."
- In 17 of these counties, where Negroes constitute a majority of the population, they either "do not vote at all or do so only in small numbers."

There is apparently no uniform practice among local power structures on Negro voting rights. The 1961 report tends to stress the variations which range as widely as 49 percent registration in Dade County (Miami), Florida, to the rural counties where no members of the majority Negro population register.

However, the Commission does notice some broad socio-economic tendencies: urban registration and voting among Negroes tends to be higher than rural; in the rural areas there tends to be an inverse relationship between Negro population and Negro registration.

The degree of economic control by whites plays an important role in determining the extent of civil rights granted the Negro. In cash-crop, share and tenant-farm areas experiencing contraction of their economies and having a high percentage of Negroes, the Negro is in an especially weak position and his human and civil rights are held to very low levels. With greater agricultural and industrial diversification, less centralized white economic control and smaller Negro populations, conditions in such areas tend to be somewhat better for the Negro.

CHARLES STEINBERG is Research Director of the Department of Labor Education, Pennsylvania State University.

But variations in patterns of discrimination in the South should not be overdrawn. The Commission's observations admittedly are of relative conditions. Its criteria for discrimination tend to be those which would lend themselves or would lead to successful legal action. Sworn complaints of deprivations and private-party litigation to secure voting rights are two of the four criteria used. Actions by the Attorney General, and the circumstantial evidence of no or very low registration in areas with high Negro populations, are the other two. The absence of such overt symptoms is scarcely proof of the absence of discrimination.

Regarding voting rights, however, there is a general disparity between Negro and white participation in southern political life. By comparing the percentages of white and non-white in voting age population with their percentages, where available, in total registration in 11 southern states, it becomes evident that non-whites usually account for a substantially smaller percentage of total registration than they do of voting age population in these states.

Measurement of the deprivation of voting rights is very difficult. Obviously, registrars practicing discrimination are reluctant to give information. Until recently, only five states gave official registration figures by race; in some of the five this practice has already been discontinued. The Bureau of the Census reports do not give separate registration figures. There is therefore an understandable gap in the 1961 Commission report.

At least 275 counties (about 25 percent of the 1,090 counties in 11 southern states) supplied no registration figures. By subtracting the total non-white voting age population in the counties actually given from the estimated overall non-white voting age population, it would appear the missing counties contain a non-white voting age population of almost 820,000 persons about whose voting status we have no knowledge. Even a very wide overestimation due to shifts in population in the intervening years would still leave a great many people uncounted and possibly disfranchised.

The figure of 25 percent non-white political participation in the 11 southern states cited in the 1959 report still held in 1961.

Another dimension of the general problem of disfranchisement is the way voting rights are diluted throughout the country by unequal districting and malapportionment of voting districts. These practices take on special meaning where discrimination is the rule. The inordinate political weight given rural areas everywhere is especially onerous in the South because it permits continued nourishment of the structure of disfranchisement in the rural South.

Yet in the words of the Commission report, "There are many counties in the South where a substantial Negro population not only has no voice in government but suffers extensive deprivation—legal, economic, educational and social."

How did this modern form of re-enslavement of the southern Negro come about?

The end of the Civil War found the southern economy in virtually total collapse. The end of the slave system appeared to prohibit rebuilding the plantation economy based on cash crops: tobacco, rice, indigo, cane and cotton, dependent on the export trade as much as on American markets and which, in the absence of labor-saving machinery, was unprofitable except under conditions of slave or slave-like labor.

A southern aristocracy, determined to salvage its old way of life, evolved the economic institutions of sharecropping and farm tenancy whose success depended upon retention of some form of human bondage. But how was the newly liberated Negro bent on freedom beaten down?

First, economic circumstances operated against him. In an agricultural setting there was no labor market into which he might be absorbed. As a farmer with "forty acres and a mule," it was almost impossible to make a living without capital in a land of often vast plantation holdings producing cash crops and requiring large acreages for profit. Processing, distributing and sophisticated marketing facilities and outlets as well as machinery, seed and staples were in the hands, first of the plantation owners, then of the rapidly developing storekeeper-banker class and later in the hands of absentee owners.

Credit was the economic beartrap into which the Negro had no choice but to step. Credit provided the economic basis for almost a hundred additional years of Negro peonage in the rural South.

Still the Negro struggled for freedom by political participation in the Reconstruction governments and by attempting to maintain economic independence as long as he could.

The second circumstance forcing the resubjugation of the Negro was the extension of white supremacy by the southern owning classes and their supporting structure of functionaries.

The postwar imposition of the so-called "Black Codes" in several of the southern state legislatures, which again reduced the Negro to near-slave social and economic conditions caused the dispatch of federal troops at the insistence of an incensed "Radical Republican" Congress, a number of civil rights acts and eventually the three well-known amendments to the Constitution. The Thirteenth, adopted in 1865, eliminated slavery; the Fourteenth, adopted in 1868, gave citizenship to the Negro and insisted that no state could deny equal protection of the law to any person within its jurisdiction; and the Fifteenth, adopted in 1870, guaranteed the right to vote could not be denied anyone by the United States or by any state, "on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude." Congress was empowered to create laws which would enforce the provisions of these three amendments.

Recalling this post-Civil War rash of "radicalism," many prominent historians of Reconstruction describe a chaotic era in which northern carpetbagger and southern scalawag made unholy gain out of the ravished body of a defeated South under the protection of federal troops.

In reality, during the 13 odd years of Reconstruction, the state governments, with their well-documented liabilities, existed in an atmosphere of veritable revolution. Determined to regain economic and political control over the Negro, the ex-slaveholders and their supporting apparatus worked to destroy the Reconstruction governments by sabotage, intimidation and violence, by any means at their disposal or that could be devised.

In discussing the illegal activities of the Ku Klux Klan and the dozen or so other vigilante organizations that sprang up during the Reconstruction, Guy B. Johnson pointed out: "The number of Negroes killed during reconstruction will never be known. Five thousand would probably be a conservative estimate . . ."

Less than 12 years after the Civil War, national political compromise between North and South was effected in the course of the Hayes-Tilden election of 1876-77. With the breakup of the Reconstruction governments and the eventual removal of the federal troops, southern white owners quickly regained control of state and local governments and moved to re-establish the old order by disfranchisement of the Negro.

K. H. Porter, in describing the post-Reconstruction period, said: "The activities of the Ku Klux Klan have been immortalized in book and play. Less dramatic were the practices of brute violence and intimidation, clever manipulation of ballots and ballot-boxes, false counting of votes, repeating, the use of 'tissue' ballots, illegal arrests the day before election and sudden removal of the polls."

However, C. Vann Woodward has pointed out in "The Strange Career of Jim Crow" that while segregation was a fact of life in the post-Civil War economic, social and political life of the South, segregation and disfranchisement by statute did not appear until the agrarian revolt of the 1870s and 1880s caused the emergence of a third party element.

The Negro's vote was sought in protest coalitions of Republicans, Populists and Farmers' Alliance people against the power of the Democratic Party. Southern white political factions then united to disfranchise the Negro and neutralize the opposition. Between 1889 and 1908, Woodward says, the 11 southern states provided, by statute or change in state constitution, the now well-known barriers to Negro voting: the poll tax, the literacy test, the "grandfather clause" (providing a "legal" alternative to the literacy test available to those or the descendants of those in some cases who had voted in some year prior to the establishment of Negro voting rights, thus permitting illiterate white to sidestep the literacy test) and the white primary.

It is in this historical matrix of enforced southern Negro disfranchisement that its modern setting is embedded and against which its dimensions must be measured. For the violence, actual and threatened, has befouled the southern rural atmosphere since the Civil War. It is only in the last few years that there has been no record of a lynching somewhere in the South.

Slow, painful progress has been made in the South in returning to the Negro his right to vote. The "grandfather clause" was ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in 1915. The poll tax as a discriminatory device in the South remains only in Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas and Virginia.

In the Supreme Court the legal battle of the Negro people against the white primary ran from 1927 to 1953, when the court finally struck down the last dodge of the state of Texas to maintain a white, pre-primary election.

The existence of a one-party system does not by itself define a lack of political freedom. However, its existence reflects and reenforces a monolithic power structure. And yet the Democratic Party in the South is certainly not monolithic in the usual sense. V. O. Key's "Southern Politics" has described the amazing

TOTAL POPULATION OF WHITES AND NON-WHITES OF VOTING AGE COMPARED TO REGISTERED VOTERS

1 Georgia reported only 13 of 159 counties. Figures for registered Negroes are for 1958.
2 Mississippi reported only 68 of 82 counties. Figures are for 1955.
3 South Carolina figures from 1959 report of U. S. Commission on Civil Rights.
4 Tennessee reported only 63 of 95 counties.
5 Texas reported only 213 of 254 counties.
SOURCE: 1961 Report, U. S. Commission on Civil Rights variety in southern political life. The region is marked by power struggles and countervailing forces tending to intra-party rather than the inter-party political contests of other regions having effective two-party systems.

The power and ability of the one-party system in the South to maintain itself and to control its constituency on the issue of civil rights is not measurable only by the number of federal elective offices it delivers on the national political scene. It is common coin to mention the number of years since a Republican has been sent to Congress or elected to the governorship of one of the 11 states.

There still could be an effective minority party able to elect a substantial membership to state legislatures and local offices and thus exert wholesome influence though unable to capture important positions. In the South this is simply not so.

In the lower houses of the 11 states there are 1,292 Democrats and 48 Republicans, with largest concentrations being 19 in Tennessee (against 80 Democrats) and 15 in North Carolina (against 105 Democrats); in the upper houses there are 438 Democrats and 12 Republicans. Thus in the state legislatures in the South there are 60 Republicans against 1,730 Democrats. In keeping with the facts of political life, without offering cooperation to the overwhelming Democratic majorities the 60 Republicans couldn't get the right time of day for their constituents.

The passage of remedial federal civil rights legislation flowing from the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments is one solution. The other way out of the legal bind has been to attack repressive state laws in the courts in the hope they eventually would be reviewed by the Supreme Court.

Litigating a constitutional problem in the Supreme Court is long, complicated and expensive. But more difficult for the Negro people to sustain is the knowledge that even if the courts invalidate an offensive law the southern state may then devise another law or method to disfranchise the Negro in still another way and then this law too must go through the same ordeal of litigation in the courts. Meanwhile the years go by and the discriminatory practices go on relatively undisturbed because there is no special injunctive procedure that in actual practice stops the action until the case is decided.

The court remedy has been in process for over 68 years. Over all these years and against enormous odds the Negro has never given up the struggle to invalidate in the courts the discriminatory practices sanctioned by state laws. The 1954 Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation in the schools is a clear example of the marvelous tenacity and sense of rightness with which the Negro leadership struggled for nearly 60 years to eliminate the "separate but equal" doctrine and with it segregation in the schools.

The violence in response to the 1954 and subsequent school desegregation orders is only a surface manifestation of a far deeper sickness; school boards and district members, mayors, city councils and governors of states have openly defied the Supreme Court in speech, in practice, in spite of the growing doubts of decent, moderate persons in the South who cherish their school systems.

Therefore, the real hope—the long hope of the Negro people—has been that they would one day have sufficient political influence to bring about passage of strong federal legislation containing a clear executive mandate to guarantee the spirit and letter of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments.

Through the years this hope appeared like an unrealizable dream. The civil rights act passed in 1875 was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1883. Seventy-four years elapsed before another civil rights act was passed.

The major problem with the Civil Rights Act of 1957 is that its machinery does not provide the most effective enforcement process. It is unlikely in the present atmosphere of the South that many Negroes would seek to recover damages in a federal district court. In general, the protection of Negro voting rights has been thrown back into the regional climate of white supremacy.

The Civil Rights Act of 1957 appeared to choose a long way around accepted practices for enforcement of ordinary constitutional rights.

Even the Commission was intended as a temporary body, dependent upon renewal by the legislature every two years. Renewal has become a lever in the hands of southern legislators. The two hair-breadth renewals since 1957 have been by riders on other legislation. Unlike civil rights commissions created by some state statutes, its powers are limited to investigation and recommendation. From its inception, the commission did not meet the need for an agency with administrative and regulatory powers flowing directly from a federal statute designed to implement the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments.

The results of the 1957 Act were a disappointment. Instead of the flood of relief actions it was hoped would be filed by the Department of Justice on behalf of Negroes denied the right to vote, only three cases had been initiated by the close of the biennium following the passage of the act. By the passage of the 1960 act, the total became four.

In reply to criticism, Civil Rights Division spokesmen pointed out the difficulties inherent in such actions and explained it would be poor strategy to bring suit in any but the strongest cases since the new legislation was as yet untested and would surely be challenged.

Nevertheless, it must be pointed out that in the same interim period the Civil Rights Commission, created by the same law, had gathered a mass of astonishing, unshakable evidence of southern disfranchisement of the Negro: only one Negro in every four of voting age was registered to vote. In 65 counties where Negroes predominate in the voting age population, few, and in many counties none, were registered to vote. An unmistakable pattern of virtual elimination of Negro suffrage in many parts of the South was clearly demonstrated in the 1959 report of the Civil Rights Commission.

PARTY AFFILIATIONS—STATE LEGISLATURES

The Commission itself had this to say about the effectiveness of the 1957 Act in its first two-year report: "Against the prejudice of registrars and jurors, the U.S. government appears, under present law, to be helpless to make good the guarantees of the U.S. Constitution."

Meanwhile, bitter resistance to school integration orders and the inability of the Civil Rights Division to provide relief for potential Negro voters in the South were the focal points for legislators who sought to extend the provisions of the 1957 Act.

The main points of the 1960 Act are its provisions further aiding enfranchisement of the Negro in the South. It provides that federal election records shall be preserved by the responsible election officials for 22 months and made available, with reproduction permitted, to the Attorney General's representatives upon written request. Destruction or alteration of records is forbidden. Punishment of election officials for breach of this title and power to force compliance once again rests with the U. S. District court having jurisdiction and therefore the ultimate potency of this title depends on the attitude of the court.

The new Act gives the Attorney General a second weapon by permitting him to attack patterns of voting rights denials as well as individual complaints and provides in the successful determination of such patterns for the appointment of voting referees by the court to facilitate and expedite court proceedings seeking to restore voting rights to Negroes.

These provisions extend opportunities for the Civil Rights Division to act forcefully beyond the case-at-a-time actions prescribed by the 1957 Act. But for the Negro in the South the path to the ballot box is still strewn with difficulties that appear in perspective almost like a series of barriers.

The problem of raising the political participation of the southern Negro even to the 53 percent voting level of northern Negroes is massive. The percentage of Negro participation has not even budged from its 25 percent level in the five years since the passage of the first Act, although since 1960 the Attorney General has brought suits in 15 counties in five states as of August 1961, three cases of which have been successful. He has demanded to inspect registration records in 26 counties in six states and was further successful in one Louisiana parish in returning an entire Negro roll of 1,377 registrants that had been purged to the registration lists.

Here is the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights' appraisal of the effectiveness of the 1960 law:

"Although the provisions of the 1957 and 1960 Civil Rights Acts are useful, however, they are necessarily limited means for removing racial discrimination from the franchise. Suits must proceed a single county at a time and they are time consuming, expensive and difficult. Broader measures are required if denials of constitutional rights in this area are to be quickly eliminated."

The two Administration-backed civil rights proposals before the present Congress were the Holland anti-poll tax bill and the Mansfield-Dirksen bill on literacy tests. The Holland bill has passed the Senate and is awaiting action by the House. The literacy test bill is dead for this session.

In five southern states the poll tax still deprives Negroes of the vote. While the poll tax has a deterrent effect on all low-income groups, its impact is especially strong on the Negro who is unwelcome at the registration desk. There are records of registrars having refused poll tax payments from Negroes.

And the elimination of the literacy test for those having completed six grades of public school would be an especially powerful tool in enfranchising many more people. Designed at least in part with a view to eliminating the English qualification for literate Spanish-speaking Puerto Rican citizens, the bill could help eliminate one of the widely used southern disfranchisement techniques, that of literacy and other educational voting requirements under state laws.

Both these bills would be most helpful, but what is really needed has already been inferred in the critique of the 1957 and 1960 Acts. First, the Attorney General's budget and staff should be substantially increased and the increase earmarked for the Civil Rights Division and its activities. Second, the civil rights statutes need a basic revision that would raise the penalty sufficiently to constitute a real deterrent and also to empower the Attorney General to exercise police power in allegations of violations of a citizen's voting rights. Third, a massive educational program on the right to vote is needed, launched by appropriate federal agencies and perhaps working with Negro organizations and beamed directly at the individual.

The life interests of the millions of potential Negro voters in the South—working men and women, mainly—are clearly aligned with those of the labor and liberal elements. In conjunction with a growing moderate-white electorate and continued urban growth in the South, emancipation of the Negro voter could help to re-shape and liberalize our political structure and make possible a new and greater level of development for the entire nation.

At the very least, there might be a denting of southern seniority and committee control wielded in Congress by legislators elected time after time by a fragmentary electorate in their districts, in good part because of deprivation of Negro voting rights. Enfranchise the Negro voter and there is a real chance of breaking the conservative grip on the Congress.

Even supporters of civil rights programs are often lulled into the belief that social change cannot be legislated. You can't legislate a change of heart, they say. But what the Negro people have learned in the bitter years of waiting for change is that little change can take place unless a legal framework is created—unless a conflict between what is and what ought to be is underlined by law. Only then is change initiated, a yardstick created and progress measured.

Suffrage, South

How Much Progress?

"The students down there are getting impatient," Burke Marshall told the press shortly after the Senate killed the literacy bill for the second time this May.

If Marshall's phrase was strikingly similar to "the natives are getting restless," the resemblance was probably not accidental. Marshall is an assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's enforcement of civil rights laws.

What disturbed the Justice Department official was that the Administration's literacy bill defeat ended all chance of obtaining new and meaningful civil rights legislation at a time when Southern Negroes are demanding full freedom of the ballot box.

The literacy bill fight was aimed at a key point in the Negro frustration. By law, in 26 states, a person seeking to register must qualify by passing a literacy test. As practiced in the South, the literacy qualification permits white election officials to disqualify Negro college graduates while passing whites with no more than a third grade education.

Under the Southern tests, a voter can be subjected to outright discrimination through the election official's selection of test questions. A Negro is asked to explain and interpret a provision in the state or federal constitution, with the election official ruling on the "correctness" of the interpretation —an interpretation that could well be the subject of disagreement by Supreme Court justices.

The literacy bill was designed to attack this discrimination in two ways. It would have permitted a sixth grade education to determine literacy requirements in federal elections and it would have simplified the Justice Department's task in bringing vote registration cases before the federal courts.

Last fall, the Civil Rights Commission—as one of its recommendations—called for enactment of literacy tests legislation. In its report, the commission asserted that in 129 Southern counties where Negroes are a substantial part of the population, fewer than 10 percent are registered. In 23 counties in five states, the commission reported that no Negroes are registered. Literacy qualifications, as well as economic pressure and other forms of discrimination, were found to be the chief causes of this Negro disfranchisement.

Ill D Digest
Fall '62

Two Weapons

Without federal literacy test legislation, the Justice Department has only two weapons it can use against voter discrimination. It can either institute a law suit seeking to block the intimidation of potential voters, or it can attempt to compel the registration of qualified Negroes. Both weapons involve time-consuming investigations and processes that hardly satisfy the impatient Southern Negroes who are still being denied their rights.

Where the Justice Department seeks court action to block intimidation, it must first prove that a pattern of such intimidation exists. This necessitates a study of all the records in a target county, the development of witnesses, and preparation for a lengthy trial.

In Montgomery County, Ala., for example, some 36,000 voter applications were studied by a lawyer and three assistants during a three-month period. Next, four or five government lawyers spent an additional two months getting ready for the trial, examining 160 witnesses, and handling after-trial details.

Montgomery County is only one of 67 counties in Alabama and the Justice Department has only 10 lawyers who can work full time on voting cases.

Even under these circumstances, cases can be further delayed by federal judges in the South who look with disfavor on the Justice Department's efforts. During the summer of 1960, the Justice Department asked Judge Claude Clayton to hand down an order directing Boliver County, Miss., to open its voting records for inspection.

Although the Department has obtained at least 100 similar orders, Judge Clayton spent almost two years considering the request. Almost half of the time was consumed by a dispute over whether the name of present Attorney General Robert Kennedy could be substituted for former Attorney General William Rogers. The judge demanded full briefs and oral arguments from both sides and studied the Department's request for months.

Sponsors of the federal literacy bill had hoped to overcome much of this delay. Under the measure's provisions, a sixth grade education would have been prima facie evidence of literacy in any state where literacy is a voting requirement.

According to the Justice Department, if the bill had become law, its task of proving discrimination would have been considerably eased. Instead of a detailed examination of all voting records, the Department would have been able to show—from a sampling of a Southern county's voting cards—that an estimated 80 percent of rejected Negro voters have the necessary six years of school education.

Based on the recommendations of both the Civil Rights Commission and the Justice Department, the present Administration decided to make its first fight for civil rights legislation—there had been none last year—over the literacy bill and a measure outlawing the poll tax. With its Congressional majority extremely narrow, the Administration apparently sought to push only two civil rights measures that could be acted upon without jeopardizing its trade and tax programs.

Poll Tax Fight

The first civil rights move opened in the Senate on the poll tax issue. After a 10-day filibuster, the poll tax proposal was accepted as "current business."

Southern Senators indicated that while they would go through the motions of opposition, they were not seriously battling the poll tax bill. The proposal—to outlaw the poll tax as a condition of voting in federal elections in the states of Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia — eventually passed the Senate as a Constitutional amendment requiring ratification by 38 states and two-thirds approval by both bodies of Congress. Six Southern Senators voted for the bill before it was sent to the House, where it still awaits action. Senate action on the proposed literacy bill, however, was a different story. From the outset, the Southerners made it clear that they were out to kill the measure. As was to be expected, a majority of Republicans rallied to the call for coalition solidarity.

Late in April the Dixiecrat Senators opened up their battle to talk the literacy bill to death. For two weeks, they held the Senate floor, frustrating all legislative action.

Unlike filibusters of the past, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield did not attempt to keep the Senate in continuous session. Sessions opened at the usual noon hour and recessed at a reasonable hour in the evening. The Southerners, for their part, stuck strictly to speeches. No attempt was made to invoke Senate rules that might have prolonged the sessions. As IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey remarked: "The fight for civil rights legislation in the area of voting has been a mock battle fought on bankers' hours. . . ."

On May 9, the Democratic leadership moved to shut off debate. Under Senate rules, the filibuster could only be halted by a two-thirds majority of those Senators present and voting. As expected, the move failed. Only 43 Senators voted for cloture, while 53 registered their opposition.

By failing to win even a simple majority on a civil rights cloture vote, the Senate was simply following tradition. The defeat of the cloture move protected the Senate's near-perfect record in this area.

Voting to cut off debate were 30 Democrats and 13 Republicans; in favor of continuing the filibuster were another 30 Democrats and 23 Republicans.

Immediately after losing the cloture vote, Mansfield moved to test the sentiment of the Senate on the literacy bill. A roll call vote was called on the Majority Leader's motion to table the bill. It was at this point that Congressional politics became apparent.

Since the measure was still subject to filibuster, a Senator could vote against tabling without fear that the bill would be enacted, while casting a public vote against killing the literacy measure. It was a golden opportunity to vote both ways on a controversial issue. The opportunity was too good to miss.

The Senate dutifully went on record, by a 64-33 vote, against killing the literacy bill. Thirty-eight Democrats and 26 Republicans voted against tabling.

As reporters were quick to point out, seven Democrats voted against ending the filibuster and against killing the literacy bill, while 14 Republicans also voted on both sides of the fence. If these 21 Senators had voted consistently—and truly favored the literacy bill—debate could have been ended and the measure enacted.

Instead, with the Dixie-GOP coalition again controlling the civil rights issue, the Democrats are already claiming that the literacy bill was killed through the lack of Republican support, while the GOP is pointing to the Democratic majority in the Senate and charging that the Administration should have been able to pass the measure.

A Free Ride

The Washington Post and Times-Herald editorialized: "Some of the Republicans who were against both cloture and tabling were probably eager to keep alive an issue that has caused so much controversy between Northern and Southern Democrats. No doubt some other Republicans and some Democrats who voted no in both instances assumed that a vote against tabling would be counted as a vote for 'civil rights' even though in fact it would be meaningless. In the language of politics this is known as a free ride."

A week after the first cloture defeat, Majority Leader Mansfield tried again. This time, the vote was 42-52 against the curbing of debate, with no Senator changing his mind, but with two members being absent. Just why the second vote was taken was never made clear.

Cloture Fight?

One point made clear, however, was that the Senate leadership intends to fight—during the opening days of the next session—for an amendment to the ill-famed Rule XXII, governing cloture. Sen. Mansfield told the press that the pattern of voting on the literacy bill indicates that existing rules "can deny to the Senate its full participation in the national resolution of this critical issue."

The majority leader said that "what the rules can do in the case of a civil rights question, they can do on any other great national issue . . . I think the duty of the leadership will be equally clear. It must propose to the Senate, once again, early in the next session, that the rule for closing debate be altered to reduce the present requirement of a two-thirds majority for invoking cloture." Whether these words will be affected by the cloture vote on the communication satellite remains to be seen.

While Democratic leadership in the Senate was announcing plans for next year, the Administration also was preparing to improve its civil rights "image." Sensitive to the charge that its two-year legislative record had resulted in nothing more than Senate passage of a poll tax Constitutional amendment, the White House began talking of a series of other moves.

At the top of the agenda is the President's long-awaited signing of an executive order banning racial discrimination in federally-backed public and private housing.

During the 1960 campaign, the then Senator Kennedy referred to such civil rights gains as taking "only a stroke of the pen." Most political experts claim that the President has delayed such action in the hopes of winning Southern support for important legislative measures, but that the executive order will be signed prior to this fall's Congressional elections and after the present session adjourns. According to the Wall Street Journal, "it has been all but decided to issue the housing order in September or October."

Another rumored move involves a new Justice Department attack on discriminatory voter registration practices in the South. While most of the present Southern law suits have involved rural areas, the Department is known to be working out a sampling technique that would permit it to challenge voting discrimination in the urban centers. Court approval of such a sampling system—as evidence of a pattern of discrimination—would undoubtedly speed-up civil rights progress in the Southern cities.

Still another move being considered is naming a special committee of "big businessmen" who could take an active role in the entire civil rights fight. Some Administration officials theorize that civil rights has always been given a "liberal" tag that has stopped businessmen and other community leaders from getting involved.

Present Record

Administration spokesmen assert that the President has already accomplished a great deal on the civil rights front. They point out that in addition to giving more and better jobs to Negroes in the federal government, it has advised and assisted on school integration problems; has attacked segregation in bus, air, and railroad terminals; has moved to ban segregation in hospitals built with federal aid; has continued to press for nondiscriminatory voter registration; and has used its Equal Employment Opportunity Committee to challenge job discrimination in private industry.

Despite the Administration's record, some of the strongest civil rights advocates have made it clear that they are not satisfied. Speaking in the nation's capital early this summer, Martin Luther King attacked the President's inaction on the housing order and his "failure to stand up vigorously" for sweeping civil rights legislation.

Sterling Tucker, executive director of the Washington Urban League and Roy Wilkins, of the Nat'l Association for the Advancement of Colored People, also have been critical. Tucker charged that ". . . after the initial splurge of appointments of Negroes and Jews to high posts, activity on this front came to a nearly screeching halt."

The Urban League official declared that while the New Frontier's civil rights intent is "sincere," firm Presidential leadership is needed if lasting gains are to be made.

In direct contrast to these views, the Southern Regional Council has applauded the Administration's civil rights efforts as a "genuine turning point in American racial relations." According to the Council the Administration's civil rights actions have been of an importance "comparable to that of the Supreme Court's school decision in 1954."

The Negro may be angry at the Democratic Party's Congressional record and impatient with the Administration's degree of civil rights leadership, but it seems improbable that he will vote Republican at any time in the near future. Some GOP strategists have even suggested that it would be a "waste of time" for their party to woo the vote of minority groups. These strategists point out that Republican Congressmen have nothing to lose by joining forces with the Dixiecrats, since the large Negro vote in the Northern cities is solidly against them.

As for the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, it looks for increased Southern Negro registration to "mellow" the ultra-conservatism of the Dixiecrats. Progress in this direction has been slow, but it has already brought about some important changes.

Southern Politics

Thirty years ago, of an estimated five million voting-age Negroes in the South, less than 100,000 were registered. Today, approximately 1.5 million Southern Negroes are registered. In 1961 alone, more Negroes registered in the South than were eligible to vote when Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected to his first term.

In this year's Congressional election, approximately 28 percent of the Negroes in 11 Southern states will be eligible to cast their ballots, compared to 56 percent of the white population in the same states.

These general statistics spell out potential political strength that has already caused a number of Southern politicians to drop the "white supremacy" banner and wrap themselves in "moderation." One example of this move was the vote of the six Southern Senators favoring a constitutional amendment banning the poll tax.

At the state, county and city level, the increased number of eligible Negro voters has brought similar change. During this year's South Carolina primary, Sen. Olin Johnston—facing his first rough political fight—let the state's 80,000 Negro voters know he was considerably more moderate than his extremist opponent. Johnston won.

In North Carolina, a Negro has been appointed to the State Welfare Board. Even in Mississippi, two Negroes ran for Congress for the first time since reconstruction days.

At the Southern city level, the Negro vote is no longer ignored. A majority of candidates in the Richmond, Va., city council race are openly supporting an anti-discrimination clause in the local government charter.

There seems to be little question that support for the anti-discrimination clause comes not so much from a change of personal views as a realization that the 14,000 registered Negroes in the city represent 25 percent of Richmond's total vote.

In Memphis, Tenn., the registration of 35,000 Negroes coupled with an estimated labor vote of 15,000 members, has resulted in a Democratic Congressional candidate calling for stepped-up federal action if the local areas do not move fast enough in the civil rights field.

In Birmingham, Ala., six Negroes are now members of the city's Democratic Executive Committee, while in Atlanta, Ga., the Republicans have issued public statements urging Negroes to participate in the GOP's political workshops.

At the rural county level, an increase in registered Negroes is expected to bring similar results in the not too distant future. Federal suits are undoubtedly responsible for 2,000 Negroes registering in Haywood County, Tenn. —a county where not one member of its 61 percent Negro population had ever voted before 1960.

Bullock County, Ala., presents a similar situation. Prior to a federal injunction won by the Justice Department last fall, only five Negroes were registered. This number has now increased to over 800.

No Dramatic Progress

These examples, however, cannot be used to proclaim dramatic progress throughout the South. A number of states have passed additional discriminatory legislation in an effort to slow down registration drives. Alabama has outlawed the NAACP as its main weapon against organized registration campaigns.

Mississippi legislation now makes it mandatory for a person intending to register to advertise this intention in a newspaper. Another state law would prohibit the registration of any person not of "good moral character."

Even where state law and the local interpretation of such statutes do not succeed in their purpose, there is always economic pressure and the threat of physical danger. Apathy and fear on the part of Southern Negroes, combined with a lack of faith in the democratic process, have undoubtedly sharply reduced the number of actual registrations.

Negro leaders say that these problems are hardest to overcome in areas where the educational level is low. They point out that where a large proportion of Negroes have completed high school and college, registration figures are highest.

Macon County, Ga., home of Tuskegee Institute, is a prime example. According to the 1960 Census Bureau figures, Macon had 2,800 whites and 11,900 Negroes of voting age. In March 1960, the registration lists showed 3,105 whites and 1,133 Negroes.

Judge Frank M. Johnson ordered an end to discrimination against Negroes attempting to register in Macon County some 18 months ago. He found that many Negroes with high school and college educations had been unable to qualify, while whites who had not completed grammar school were permitted to register.

Since Judge Johnston's ruling, some 1,600 additional Negroes have registered — although the Justice Department has returned to the courts on three different occasions to obtain enforcement of the Judge's order.

The experience of Macon County demonstrates that even under the most favorable conditions, the Southern Negro still faces a bitter struggle in his effort to win the full rights of citizenship.

Clearly, there has been progress in the battle to make full civil rights a reality instead of a goal. The question is, has the progress been sufficient?

Suff - Gen

February, 1963

A STATEMENT OF THE RESEARCH AIMS AND METHODS OF THE VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT

I. BACKGROUND

A. Before undertaking the Voter Education Project, the Southern Regional Council applied for and obtained a favorable ruling from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, holding that the Project was consistent with SRC's tax-exemption. In letters to the Commissioner, dated December 14, 1961 and February 9, 1962, the Project was described. The following statements, excerpted from those letters, define the research objectives:

> 1. The purpose of the Project is to enable the Council to promote and to study and evaluate methods for teaching and encouraging exercise of the right to register and vote in areas in the South which, from the Council's past research, are known to be comparatively lowest in registration and voting. The work will necessarily largely involve the Negro population.
>
> 2. The purpose of the Project is to develop educational programs which will be most effective in providing voters with the knowledge and will to register.
>
> 3. Upon the completion of the Project... a report, analysis and evaluation of the Project will be published. Such publication will describe the Project and recommend, on the basis of Project experience, the best methods of education designed to overcome low voter registration in the various geographic and cultural areas of the South.

B. From the foregoing, it is clear that

1. VEP shall not only study registration efforts, but shall promote them for the purposes of study.

2. VEP is specifically to work and research in areas "known to be comparatively lowest in registration and voting." Indeed, this is stated almost as an exclusive interest. This was not, however, intended to be the case and the fuller context of the application amply shows that.

3. Research includes voting, as well as registration, experience.

4. This is primarily experimental research, through which VEP seeks to develop effective programs.

5. Recommendations, therefore, are to constitute a large part of the research product.

II. OBJECTIVES

V.E.P. is substantially the largest research ever undertaken by the Council. The resulting publication will be, unlike the usual SRC release, of book length.

Nevertheless, we do not intend nor should we, to depart from the established objectives of SRC research and publishing. These are:

(a) to inform national opinion accurately and with sound interpretation;

(b) as a special end, to inform southern leaders, both directly and through the press;

(c) to contribute to the formulation of public policies.

Stated this way, there is nothing to preclude research done according to the exacting standards of the social sciences. We do, however, need to keep in mind that the three objectives set out above do preclude the statement of research findings in such ways as require interpretation or translation: our business is to speak directly to the public.

Moreover, our business is to address ourselves to the concerns of public policy, and not to those of social science. As do any disciplines, the social sciences have developed problems which are largely intra-mural in their interest. All the issues of public policy are of interest to the social sciences; the reverse is neither obviously nor probably so. The VEP will not, therefore, seek to serve social science in such ways as the refinement of methodologies or the verification of statistical probabilities.

III. RESEARCH PROBLEM

The research problem of the VEP might be re-stated as:

> A study of the effectiveness of organized effort - political activity in the broadest sense - in attacking the cause of low registration in the various sections of the South.

Stated this way, the relationship between the VEP and the Matthews-Prothro work is made more obvious. For the, after close and exhaustive analysis of the social and economic variables of registration, raise the question of the relative importance of these variables, on the one side, against political and legal factors and organized Negro and white supremacist activity on the other. The following is quoted from their paper at the Duke University Conference of July 12 - 14, 1962:*

> We have seen that both social and economic factors and political and legal factors are associated with Negro voter registration in the 11 southern states. Which type of factor is more important in shaping Negro registration rates?
>
> ...In so far as statistical analysis will answer such a broad and complex question, it would appear that political variables are of about equal importance to socio-economic ones.
>
> . . .
>
> Moreover, our analysis suggests that substantial changes in the level of Negro voter registration can be attained by political and legal means. It is not necessary to await the arrival of basic social and economic change before attempting, with reasonable expectations of moderate success, to enfranchise more southern Negroes. The abolition of the poll tax and modification of literacy requirements to assure fair treatment of Negroes might enhance the southwide vote of Negro registration by 10 or more percentage points. Encouraging the candidacy of politicians -- both Negro and white -- who are favorable to the Negro cause should bring out many more Negro votes, even when they have little chance of success. Finally, heightened organizational efforts by Negroes would increase Negro registration levels over what they would otherwise be. All of these reforms would have a positive effect on Negro registration rates without waiting for massive social and economic change.

---

*"Negro Voter Registration in the South."

VEP can, of course, only take note of and seek to analyze and evaluate legal changes and political candidacies. This will be done. But the "heightened organizational efforts" spoken of by Matthews and Prothro is VEP's special problem. VEP is experimental research, where by organized methods VEP will seek to make the findings set down as objectives in the I.R.S. letters quoted above.

Moreover, the political process is a primary means by which the social and economic benefits of society are distributed. The social and economic variables and the political and legal variables do not, therefore, represent the two sides of a dichotomy. Rather, they represent the two phases of a process in which, at any given moment, existing social and economic conditions are conducive to or permissive of certain political and legal innovations; and they, in turn, will have their effect in altering the social and economic conditions.

The VEP will accept the Matthews-Prothro analysis as the latest authoritative study of the social and economic variables. The Matthews-Prothro analysis of racial attitudes will also be assumed,* except where explicitly questioned.

The various parts of the re-statement above may be separately considered:

(a) "a study of the effectiveness of organized effort"

VEP is dealing with a wide variety of organizations -- all devoted to civil rights -- including national organizations such as

*"Southern Racial Attitudes: Conflict, Awareness, and Political Change," Annals of the American Academy. November 1962.

NAACP, the National Urban League, CORE;

a regional body, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference;

and the unique

Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee;

including also a large number of local organizations, ranging from such sophisticated groups as

All-Citizens Registration Committee (Atlanta)

Durham (N.C.) Committee on Negro Affairs to inexperienced groups such as

Federated Organization for the Cause of Unlimited Self-Development (FOCUS) - Baton Rouge;

the organizations include also ad hoc ones that VEP helped bring into existence, such as

Council of Federated Organizations (Miss.)

Jefferson County (Ala.) Voters Campaign; and popular crusades such as the Albany (Ga.) Movement.

The organizations differ greatly - in their structure, their attitudes, their methods of work, their uses of publicity, and their reputations. All of these differences are deserving of study, and of some critique as to effectiveness. The VEP should not shirk the opportunity of contributing some informed evaluations of the varieties of organized Negro political activity, at this still formative period of a relatively new development that will undoubtedly persist and grow, long after the dramatic controversies of civil rights have been ended.

Some organizations tend to work in different local situations, and this is usually a matter of deliberate choice on their part. This, itself, raises an issue of research interest, because the choices represent, to some degrees, divergent views of strategy. One view favors a concentrated, almost sole, effort in the more liberal locales, where the barriers are essentially only the apathy or alienation of Negroes. The other inclines toward work in the heavily resistant, Black Belt locales. Evaluation of these two approaches merely in terms of new registrants would be pointless, because those will undoubtedly be comparatively few in the resistant areas. The work there, however, represents a strongly held belief that political leverage can be realized by token gains, by opening the bottle, by laying the basis for court suits, by stimulating national publicity, by exposing the crudity of the segregationists' methods, and most of all, by providing the initial opportunity for residents to organize themselves. VEP cannot hope to evaluate such work quantitatively, but the notion that social science is confined to quantitative findings is a recent one, and perhaps not an unrelenting tenet. In fact, nearly all interesting social study of a quantitative sort has had to be given stimulus and direction by preceding observation, analysis, and interpretation of disciplined minds.

Another matter of great interest will be the observation of the effectiveness of local groups. As mentioned above, these include both the experienced and the inexperienced. Some operate with the support -- of various sorts -- of national and regional organizations (other than VEP), and some without.

(b) "political activity in the broadest sense."

The VEP is wisely restricted to work with non-partisan groups and efforts. Registration itself is, however, a political act, and each registration contributes a mite of influence on political alignments and decisions. How much, however, is that influence, how does it work, and to whose benefit in the differing situations of the South, and at differing levels of total white and total Negro registration? Such questions as the following are interesting:

1. does the simple act of Negro registration, or knowledge of the existence of an organized effort to stimulate registration, provoke response, of any ascertainable kind, from officials or from official bodies or from private whites?

2. does increased Negro registration stimulate white registration and voting?

3. what ascertainable increase in Negro voting is produced by increased Negro registration?

4. what are the repercussions of increased Negro registration, or organized efforts to that end, on national politics and policies?

(c) "in attacking the causes of low registration in the various sections of the South."

A great deal of research has been done in the past, some by SRC, some by the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, and some by academic scholars, on the causes of low registration. These have been generally concluded to be:

1. outright governmental prohibition of Negro registration (since the outlawing of the white primary this has ended as an openly acknowledged practice and, for the most part, has ended in practice, though a few isolated instances persist where local authorities, without pretense otherwise, will not register Negroes).

2. governmental cheating, i.e., the administration of qualifications more strictly for Negroes than for whites, or the capricious or arbitrary rejection of Negroes, or the administration of registration in ways to slow or make personally uncomfortable Negro registration.

3. governmental restrictions against new registrations in such a way as to limit both whites and Negroes (e.g., poll taxes).

4. governmental harassment in reprisal against Negro registration, by such multiform devices as capricious arrest of registration workers, cancellation of governmental services for properties used in registration activities, investigations, etc., etc.

5. private harassment, intimidation, violence, and economic reprisal.

6. Negro indifference (apathy)

7. Negro alienation

8. Negro ignorance, i.e., inability to pass literacy requirements

9. Negro fear

10. in some areas (e.g., Virginia) an effective, if infrequently stated, bias against democratic control, to such an extent that voting, by either Negroes or underprivileged whites, is not part of the tissue of civic values.

These causes do, of course, have extreme variations of importance, according to time and place, and there exists a considerable body of analysis of each.

A basic research interest of the VEP will be, in each area, to appraise, against a defined pattern of local obstacles, the effectiveness of certain organizational structures and methods.

* * * * *

To sum up, the VEP, as a program of experimental research, has set itself the problem of devising, within its limited field of concern, means by which the political participation of deprived groups within the United States can be stimulated. The VEP supposes that increased political participation is a feasible means of bettering the living conditions of deprived groups. The implicit assumption is that the political process is a primary means by which the benefits of society are distributed. This assumption is, of course, basic to democratic theory.

IV. GENERAL OUTLINE

An attempt at this stage to outline the final publication would be foolhardy. The scheme set out below is, therefore, only an aid to visualizing content and a scheme for organizing work assignments.

1. Background material
   a. most accurate and complete figures yet as to registration totals by race
   b. Analysis of these, in terms of such subjects as:
      - geographic variation
      - rural/urban comparisons
      - educational levels
      - economic indices (e.g., housing costs)
   c. Descriptive and interpretive essay on southern politics during period of VEP
2. VEP record
   a. a report, made up chiefly of figures, on each project and its success
   b. a concise narrative history of the projects
3. Research findings
   a. As of the initiation of each drive, what were the factors inhibiting registration?

b. Methods used to overcome

1. organizational

2. techniques

3. success

c. Anatomy of the factors

1. apathy: prevalence, characteristics, manifestations

2. alienation: ditto

3. apprehension of terror, and response

4. apprehension of white disapproval, and response

5. reaction to official cheating

d. Suitability of organized efforts to cope with the factors

4. Registration and reform

a. During the VEP period, what effects did increased registration have on elections, and also on other civil rights interests?

b. Based on observed trends, what effects can be expected?

V. MODES OF WORK

The statistical compilations and analysis noted above in 1a and 1b will be done by VEP staff, supplementing official and other published records with data gathered from the field programs.

The data required for sections 2a and b, 3a, and 3b will be obtained in several ways:

a. From field reports sent in by the cooperating agencies. VEP prescribes the forms of these reports. Many of the agencies are not good reporters, and this is hardly unexpected. On the other hand, some of the reporting has been remarkably good and valuable. (Examples of this kind of quality are the report of the Middle Tennessee Voter Registration Project: the National Urban League's report on its Winston-Salem campaign; the reporting of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee in its Summer, 1962 Mississippi work; and, among several others, the reporting of the Albany Movement.)

b. From field observations carried on by VEP staff. Limitations of staff make impossible the close field study of each project. VEP plans to visit each, however, and will do intensive field study of some, selected for distinctive characteristics.

c. From news reports, government sources including legal proceedings, correspondence and conversations with informed local persons, and other sources.

The data required for section 3c and, in part, for sections 3d and 4a will be obtained in the same manner. This is a convenient place to note specifically that rigorously controlled survey research is not contemplated as a regular research tool. The findings for 3c (as well as 3a) will be drawn from the full range of field reports and observations. Some of the cooperating agencies are carrying out interviews, and these are useful. But systematic sampling and interviews are beyond the range of our resources and research interests. VEP is using conversations heavily, and will expand these even more, but with selected informed and involved persons. These include officials, workers within the cooperating agencies, and other informed people. VEP recognizes that the selection of officials and "other informed people" will be determined not only by availability, but also by the referral of cooperating agencies and by VEP's own judgment as to the value of the interview.

The work on section 3d will be supplemented by staff review and evaluation; on 4a, by statistical compilation done by VEP staff.

Direct planning and supervision of all the above work will be the responsibility of the VEP Director.

The work of synthesis and interpretation, under 1c and 4b, will be a joint undertaking of VEP staff and the SRC Research staff.

The final ordering of data and writing will be under the direction of the SRC Executive Director.

4-10-63

He points out that in 1958 it was the belief of both Russian and American scientists that there would have to be an international inspection system with about 180 control posts, of which 19 would be in the Soviet Union. It would have taken between 4 to 6 years to install this system; scores of international technicians would have been included in the project; the system would have cost $2 billion to build and several hundred million dollars a year to maintain. Today no such system needs to be established at all.

The United States, like Russia, can now identify nuclear tests in the atmosphere, under water, and in outer space. If Russia would agree to a treaty outlawing such tests, the risks of successful evasion or cheating would form no problem. The real concern is with tests conducted underground where they may be harder to detect or may be confused with earthquakes.

Senator HUMPHREY reports that in the past 5 years the United States has greatly improved its ability to identify earthquakes in Russia. It is a generous figure to suggest that these unidentified occurrences in any one year will be "only a few dozen at most." Under the British-American treaty each of these mysterious events would be subject to inspection. From a scientific or technical standpoint, the problem of security is wholly manageable. Russia would soon learn this fact if it were willing to give the proposed treaty a fair trial.

Senator HUMPHREY asked the Kennedy administration to make available the results of studies of underground events in Russia from 1958 through 1962. He has quoted "a competent administration official in whom I repose the highest confidence" as saying that the United States has the present ability to monitor a test ban agreement with full safeguards for American security.

Under these new arrangements it would be necessary to supplement these monitoring devices by inspections inside Russia carried out by inspectors who could be accompanied by Soviet observers. The inspected area would be small and would be located by using the records of at least four detection stations. There would be no more than seven inspections each year. The treaty would lapse and the United States would be free to resume its tests if Russia refused to agree to any suggested inspection or was caught in a secret test.

Since the 1960 campaign Mr. Kennedy has shown much more eagerness than the general public to reach a disarmament agreement with Russia, above all on a test ban treaty. The public has tended to view the Geneva talks with resigned apathy as a meaningless charade. Yet all the time hard-working and often misunderstood officials have been closing the gap between the Russian and American positions, while always striving for a treaty that would be endorsed by two-thirds of the Senate. It is high time that we realize that American public indifference is very helpful to Russia in resisting a treaty. For Russia can twist and equivocate at Geneva without being called to account by a bored American press.

Miss.

The Crisis of Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM FITTS RYAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 10, 1963

Mr. RYAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article on the voter registration drive in Leflore County, Miss., which appeared in the New York Times on April 6, 1963. This article describes the violence, threats and intimidation which have marked the fight for constitutional rights in Greenwood, Miss.

I have long been concerned over the stiuation in Leflore County. Last August the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee started its campaign in Leflore County to have Negroes register to vote. This campaign has met with extreme hostility which, as the New York Times article points out, has broken out in violence. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is dedicated to the fundamental principles of our democracy. These students deserve our highest admiration, for they are truly fighting in the frontline of liberty.

Afer the campaign to register Negroes began, the Leflore County officials announced that they would not distribute U.S. agricultural surpluses. Since over 90 percent of the surplus food which the county receives free from the Federal Government is distributed to Negroes, this was an obvious move to retaliate against the registration campaign. When this was brought to my attention, I urged the Secretary of Agriculture to take appropriate action. After the Department of Agriculture announced that it would distribute the food if necessary, the county officials finally gave in and began to distribute the food.

The New York Times article also relates the many instances of violence against those who have participated with great courage in the registration drive. As soon as it was clear that violence was being used to stop the registration drive, I urged the Department of Justice to intervene. I am happy that the Department of Justice has filed a suit in Greenwood, Miss.

Mississippi State Representative Karl Wiesenburg of Jackson County, Miss., in an article for the Pascagoula (Miss.) Chronicle stated the problem well when he said:

States rights must be coexistent with State responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, in order to further the understanding of the crisis of democracy in Mississippi I commend the following article to all my colleagues:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 6, 1963]

MISSISSIPPI COUNTY IS TURNED INTO MAJOR BATTLEGROUND OF NEGROES' CIVIL RIGHTS FIGHT—TENSION BUILDS UP AFTER GUN ATTACK; VOTER-REGISTRATION DRIVE IS INTENSIFIED AFTER LEADER IS WOUNDED BY VOLLEY

(By Claude Sitton)

GREENWOOD, MISS., April 5.—The night of February 28 was mild with a hint of early spring as the black sedan rolled westward along U.S. Route 82 across the Mississippi Delta.

One of its three Negro occupants recalled later that as a string of traffic faded to the rear near Itta Bena, a car that had trailed them from Greenwood pulled alongside. Two white men sat in front, one in back.

Bursts of gunfire rang out. Thirteen .45-caliber bullets stitched a ragged seam of fingersized holes along the sedan's left side and one copper-jacketed slug burned into the drivers shoulder to within an inch of his spine.

The wounded man, James Travis of Jackson, Miss., recovered. He has since returned here to his voter registration work as a field secretary for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

THREE WHITES ARRESTED

Five days after the shooting Sheriff John Ed Cothron of Leflore County arrested three Greenwood whites, who were charged with felonious assault. Two are well-known citizens—William H. Greenlee, a petroleum products wholesaler, and Wesley Kersey, service manager for an industrial company. The third is a juvenile.

This shooting incident, the first of several, set off a string of events that has turned Leflore County into a major battleground in the Southern civil rights struggle.

Mr. Travis' companions in the car were Robert P. Moses, a field secretary of the student committee and director of the Council of Federated Organizations, and Randolph Blackwell, field director of the voter education project.

The council, known as Cofo, is a coalition of Negro organizations that began a concerted voter registration drive in the Delta last summer. The voter education project, established last year by the southern regional council, has provided funds for Cofo's work.

The attack on the three men set off an angry flurry of activity in the project's headquarters at 5 Forsyth Street in Atlanta.

BIG CAMPAIGN PLANNED

Wiley A. Branton, director of the project, announced a saturation campaign to register Leflore's Negroes, who make up about 64 percent of the county's population of 47,142.

"The State of Mississippi," he asserted, "has repeatedly thrown down a gauntlet at the feet of would-be Negro voters, not only by the discriminatory practices of the registrar, but also by the economic pressures, threats, coercions, physical violence and death to Negroes seeking the right to vote," he said.

"The time has come for us to pick up the gauntlet. Leflore County has elected itself as the testing ground for democracy and we are accordingly meeting the challenge there."

Leflore County lies on the eastern bulge of the Delta, a football-shaped expanse of fertile fields, pasture lands and swampy stands of hardwood. This alluvial plain, bounded roughly by the rolling loops of the Mississippi and Yazoo Rivers, stretches flat as a table for 200 miles between Memphis and Vicksburg.

The tree-screened beauty of its Greek-revival mansions contrasts with the weather-beaten squalor of the shacks of clapboard and tarpaper that stand amid the long brown furrows that lie waiting for the cotton and soybean seed.

In recent years, increasingly efficient machines and chemicals have revolutionized agriculture here.

NEED FOR LABOR CUT

But mechanization has slashed the need for labor by more than half. Many Negroes have moved away but many still remain.

Greenwood is the State headquarters for the Citizens' Council, a militantly segregationist organization founded in 1954 in adjoining Sunflower County.

The John Birch Society followed the council to Greenwood.

Many whites consider the voter registration campaign a Communist plot. Mayor Charles E. Sampson, a loyal member of the Citizens' Council, echoed their sentiments last week when he said that "the only purpose of these agitators is to follow the Communist line of fomenting racial violence."

There are a number of whites who disagree with this attitude and who contend that some compromise must be made with the demands of the Negroes. But they are afraid to speak out publicly.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee began a registration campaign last August in Leflore County. This committee, which grew out of the 1960 sit-in demonstrations against lunch counter segregation, has headquarters in Atlanta.

Two young Delta Negroes were designated as field secretaries for the project—Willie B. Peacock, of Charleston, Miss., and Samuel T. Block, of Cleveland, Miss.

A tall, gaunt youth of 25, Mr. Block became the chief target of white animosity in the campaign's early stages. He initially called attention to himself by asserting that he had been beaten by whites at a local automobile parts business. This drew the first in a long string of denials from whites, who said that they had seen no bruises on him.

The Leflore voter drive met little success last year, according to Mr. Moses. The 28-year-old Negro, who holds a masters degree in philosophy, left his job as a mathematics teacher at the Horace Mann School in New York in July 1961, to come to Mississippi as a field secretary for the student committee.

FEW ABLE TO QUALIFY

His explanation for the poor showing is the same one repeated privately by white officials; under present State voting regulations, few if any Negroes can pass the test.

Most whites of voting age were registered when the more stringent regulations went into effect.

Mrs. Martha T. Lamb, Leflore County circuit court clerk and registrar, said she did not know how many Negroes were registered because records were not kept by race. She and six other Mississippi registrars are defendants in a broad-scale legal attack on the voting laws that is now before a Federal court.

The Justice Department, which brought the suit, states in its complaint that there are 10,274 whites and 13,567 Negroes of voting age in Leflore County. Approximately 95.5 percent of the whites and 1.9 percent of the Negroes are registered.

The suit contends that white political supremacy is maintained by regulations that include the following:

Registrants must be able to read, write, and interpret any section of the Mississippi Constitution to the registrar's satisfaction;

Registrants must be of good moral character, as determined by the registrar; and

Names of applicants and their addresses must be published for 2 consecutive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the county.

SAYS IT APPLIES TO ALL

"It applies equally to all, white and black alike," said a member of the county board of supervisors with a grin in defending publication of the names.

Despite their dismal prospects, Negroes began applying for registration in increasing numbers in February.

The key factor in the increased applications for registration, according to Mr. Moses and a number of white observers, was the growing hunger among the field hands and the refusal of the county to relieve it by distributing surplus food provided by the Federal Government.

Until last fall, Leflore gave the food to public welfare recipients all year long. It expanded the program during the winter months to include all needy persons.

The county spent only $38,000 of its $2,095,874 budget for the 1961–62 fiscal year to store and distribute the food to 27,000 persons, about 90 percent of whom were Negroes.

MALNUTRITION REPORTED

But the board of supervisors voted to drop the program for nonwelfare recipients last fall. They explained recently that it had cost more than the county could afford and was not needed because of a bumper crop.

Four Justice Department lawyers who toured the county earlier this month reported that they had found widespread evidence of malnutrition.

Among the cases they describe was that of a mother who could offer her children only a breakfast of fried hoecake and sirup made from water and sugar. Another family had had no breakfast at 10 o'clock and said their dinner the night before had been pinto beans and blackeyed peas.

Other families said they had one big meal a week—chicken for Sunday morning breakfast.

A 34-year-old widow with nine children, ages 1 to 13, had only one bed and a bottomless chair in her shanty home. She said the plantation manager had given her $3 a week "furnish money" to be repaid from her earnings and those of her children. She was asked what she did after the cotton chopping and picking seasons.

"Ain't nothing to do but just wait on the calendar," she replied.

A night visit by two newsmen to a plantation cabin found a 57-year-old Negro hand, his wife and 11 of their 13 children crowded before an old television set in 1 of the 4 rooms.

The crisp stage setting of the Mikado, which they were watching, contrasted with the few pieces of sagging furniture, the split and peeling paper on the walls, the pine floor studded with patches of ancient linoleum and a two-eyed wood stove resting on an automobile wheel rim.

HAS $10 LEFT OVER

The man, a carpenter and mechanic's helper in the plantation's repair shop, said he made 40 cents an hour or about $20 a week. He receives $10 after payments on a Christmas loan and medical bills are deducted.

The family had just finished a supper of cornbread and fried potatoes. There was no milk for the children.

He was asked what he would choose if granted one wish.

"Rights," he replied. "Freedom, free to speak, free to have a voice, to speak, not be condemned or nothing like that. You know we don't have no voice out here."

As a result of the Justice Department's investigation, the Department of Agriculture told the county that the Federal Government would pay the cost of distributing the surplus food. If the county still refused, the department said, the Government would step in and do the job.

The board of supervisors agreed reluctantly to resume the program with the Government paying the cost. And this week hundreds of Negroes flocked to a warehouse here to receive the food.

HUNGER HELPS DRIVE

Hunger and the urging of the voter registration workers brought more and more Negroes to the county courthouse on the Yazoo's south bank to register. Committee officials obtained a three-room office in a ramshackle building on McLaurin Street and the harassment resumed.

The campaign workers reported another violent episode the night of March 6. Mr. Block said a station wagon had pulled alongside a car in which he and three others were sitting. A shotgun roared once.

The charge of buckshot was fired at such close range that it failed to disperse as it smashed one front window of the car and then the other before gouging into the wall of a home, the Negroes said.

City officials, in a statement, suggested that the incident was a hoax.

"Either by good luck or prearrangement, none of the occupants of the car was injured by the gunfire," he said.

No explanation was offered for the fact that three occupants had been cut by flying glass.

FIRE ON THEATER CROWD

The next night, Mr. Moses reported, a sedan carrying four whites drew up in front of a Negro theater. One pulled out a pistol and fired toward a group waiting on the sidewalk. No one was hit.

Last week brought more violence and the Federal intervention that the city had sought to avoid. Nightriders fired two blasts of buckshot into a voter worker's home Monday.

"Again, through good fortune or advanced planning, no one was hurt," Mayor Sampson and the city commissioners said in a statement.

The next morning, about 100 Negroes marched to the City Hall to protest the incident and to demand protection. At the mayor's orders, the police dispersed them with a German shepherd dog. The dog attacked two voter registration workers.

In all, nine of the workers, including the top leaders, were arrested. Eight of them were later given the maximum penalty for disorderly conduct—4 months in prison and a $200 fine.

MINISTER BITTEN BY DOG

Rev. D. L. Tucker, a minister active in the drive, was bitten Wednesday by the police dog as officers scattered a group of Negroes marching homeward after having applied for registration. He was scrambling to get away from the dog when bitten.

Dick Gregory, the comedian, arrived in Greenwood last Monday. Although he taunted the police as he led groups of Negroes in attempts to walk to the courthouse throughout the week, he was not arrested.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department had filed a request for a Federal court order against city and county officials before District Judge Claude F. Clayton, Jr. It sought to force them to take the following actions:

Release the eight registration workers from prison;

Refrain from further interference with the campaign; and Permit Negroes to exercise their constitutional rights to assemble for peaceable protests and to protect them from whites who might molest them.

FIRST SUCH INTERVENTION

The action marked the first time in the civil rights struggle that the Department had interceded to preserve the right of peaceful protest.

However the Department and the city agreed yesterday that Justice Department attorneys would delay their attempt to obtain the injunctions and the city would stay execution of the sentences against the eight registration workers.

The Department reportedly was concerned over the threat of violence in Greenwood and the possibility that mass demonstrations might lead to a riot.

There is considerable evidence that an explosion has been averted here so far only because leaders of the citizens' council have restrained the more emotional whites. The council's members here include the city's business and professional leaders.

The Department's action disappointed sponsors of the voter registration drive.

WILL KEEP UP CAMPAIGN

Campaign leaders issued a statement yesterday pledging continued attempts by prospective voter applicants to walk in groups to the courthouse.

However, a temporary truce in the crisis was reached today between voter-campaign leaders and city officials. The latter agreed that while racial tensions made it necessary they would provide bus transportation between the drive's headquarters and the courthouse.

After tensions subside, according to Police Commissioner B. A. Hammond, the city will permit groups of no more than 20 or so to walk to the courthouse together so long as there is no threat of disorder.

Despite the violence, harassment, and intimidation, the campaign has picked up momentum. Hundreds of persons packed the mass meetings in the city's Negro churches to cheer top leaders in the civil rights movement.

If local whites could hear the statements being made they might question the accuracy of the Commonwealth's recent observation that "nothing will be changed after democracy has been tested here."

"The white folks are scared," asserted the Rev. James Bevel at one such session. "That's why they turned the dog loose."

BLAME MANY FACTORS

Leflore County's whites have blamed the voter registration workers, the Kennedy administration and the Communists, in about that order, for the racial crisis.

"It's outsiders that's causing it," said Mayor Sampson recently. "We give them everything. We're building them a new swimming pool. We work very close with the nigger civic league. They're very satisfied."

However, some whites conceded readily in private that it would take more than a new swimming pool to resolve the controversy. Sooner or later, they said, the county will be forced to administer reasonable voting tests and to place all qualified persons on the rolls.

Whose Side Are We on in Cuban Crisis?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM C. CRAMER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 10, 1963

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, John Chamberlain has written an illuminating comparison of Fidel Castro and a true hero in Cuban history, Jose Marti, and from this relative estimate is prompted to ask of the present administration, "Who's side are we on?" when we denounce the efforts of some courageous Cuban patriots who are trying bravely to regain their homeland.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following complete text of Mr. Chamberlain's column as it appeared in the Charleston Daily Mail on March 27.

The article follows:

[From the Charleston (W. Va.) Daily Mail, Mar. 27, 1963]

WHOSE SIDE ARE WE ON IN THE CUBAN CONTROVERSY?

(By John Chamberlain)

It was an old, musty, dogeared volume, the sort of thing you pick up on the remainder shelves of secondhand book shops for a nickel. It's title, a longwinded one, was "The War in Cuba, Being a Full Account of Her Great Struggle For Freedom, Containing a Complete Record of Spanish Tyranny and Oppression; Scenes of Violence and Bloodshed; Frequent Uprisings of a Gallant and Long Suffering People." The date of publication was 1896, 2 years before the Spanish-American War.

I brought it home from Miami, and have been trying, at odd moments, to penetrate the dense jungle of its florid 19th century prose. What keeps you going through the worst of the purple passages is the odd sincerity that dwells just below the surface of the cliche-ridden text. Jose Marti, the Cuban patriot, is decked out in all sorts of angelic colors—but, discounting the tropical flowers of oratory (the work of Gonzalo de Quesada, the Cuban republicans' representative in Washington during the 1890's), he comes through as a warm, sentient human being, idealist and realist in one.

I had never known much about Marti before. Like the young Fidel Castro who staged an impossible attack on a Batista strongpoint for its symbolic value, knowing that it must fail, Marti took his chances at the age of 16 when he claimed the authorship of an anti-Spanish article which he had not himself written. But Marti's motivation was different from Castro's; he performed his Quixotic act to save a friend. He was jailed, then exiled to Spain, from which he escaped. For 25 years thereafter Marti worked for a free Cuba supporting guerrilla activity from New York City. It was Marti who created the Cuban Home Rule Party, who arranged for arms shipments to the insurgents, and who took the field eventually as a Cuban rebel general despite the fact that he had had no experience in soldiering.

Gonzalo de Quesada describes the death and martyrdom of Marti on the soil of Cuba in words that sound like an excerpt from an old melodrama: "Under the palms, on a white steed * * * he fell. There, where our only majestic river, the Cauto, opens its arms, where from the rising grounds, the valleys, like a motherly bosom, invite the eternal rest, canopied by a gray firmament, there, where the world seems to dilate, Jose Marti battled for the last time against Spanish tyranny * * * he charges; his spirited horse carries him ahead of his men; it is his first engagement, it is his last victory; he rolls from his horse, fallen, wounded; his breast is riddled with bullets; the murderous lead entering under his chin has disfigured the firm mouth; the heavy mustache is burnt; his golden tongue is forever silent."

Reading de Quesada's perfervid words, you squirm. But you can't quite laugh, for the veneration so flamboyantly expressed still carries a ring of truth after 67 years.

If Marti had lived to become the first President of a free Cuban Republic, he would have scorned to go back on his word. Castro promised the Cubans that the Constitution of 1940 would be restored after the defeat of Batista; he promised a free press; he promised free scope for any and all businessmen who had not collaborated with the Batista government. Every single promise has been betrayed. Marti would have scorned to put a single Cuban under the yoke of an alien Old World power. Castro has delivered all the Cubans in Cuba to Moscow.

Reading the old dogeared book of 1896, I kept thinking about an article I wrote back in the 1930's, about Venezuela, when that South American country was trying to pick up the pieces after the death of the tyrant Juan Vicente Gomez, who had ruled it from 1908 to 1935. Gomez was a caudillo, a petty general, who pretended to have the good of his country at heart. Called "el bagre," the catfish, and "el brujo," the witch doctor, Gomez was feared by everybody—and he ended by being loved by nobody.

Castro pretends to wear the mantle of Marti. But underneath the "buche y pluma," or wind and feathers, he is the contemporary version of Gomez. When Marti was carrying on his struggle against "Butcher" Weyler, the Spanish general sent from Madrid to hold Cuba in thrall, the United States accorded him the rights of a belligerent. But our State Department denounces the modern disciples of Marti, the Cubans who are banded together in Alpha 66, for hitting some Russians while raiding the Cuban coast. Is the State Department on the side of the shade of Jose Marti? Or does it prefer the shade of "Catfish" Gomez?

LAWS RELATIVE TO THE PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS

Either House may order the printing of a document not already provided for by law, but only when the same shall be accompanied by an estimate from the Public Printer as to the probable cost thereof. Any executive department, bureau, board or independent office of the Government submitting reports or documents in response to inquiries from Congress shall submit therewith an estimate of the probable cost of printing the usual number. Nothing in this section relating to estimates shall apply to reports or documents not exceeding 50 pages (U.S. Code, title 44, sec. 140, p. 1938).

Resolutions for printing extra copies, when presented to either House, shall be referred immediately to the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate, who, in making their report, shall give the probable cost of the proposed printing upon the estimate of the Public Printer, and no extra copies shall be printed before such committee has reported (U.S. Code, title 44, sec. 133, p. 1937).

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS FOR SALE

Additional copies of Government publications are offered for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D.C., at cost thereof as determined by the Public Printer plus 50 percent: Provided, That a discount of not to exceed 25 percent may be allowed to authorized bookdealers and quantity purchasers, but such printing shall not interfere with the prompt execution of work for the Government. The Superintendent of Documents shall prescribe the terms and conditions under which he may authorize the resale of Government publications by bookdealers, and he may designate any Government officer his agent for the sale of Government publications under such regulations as shall be agreed upon by the Superintendent of Documents and the head of the respective department or establishment of the Government (U.S. Code, title 44, sec. 72a, Supp. 2).

PRINTING OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD EXTRACTS

It shall be lawful for the Public Printer to print and deliver upon the order of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the person ordering the same paying the cost thereof (U.S. Code, title 44, sec. 185, p. 1942).

CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY

The Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, may print for sale, at a price sufficient to reimburse the expenses of such printing, the current Congressional Directory. No sale shall be made on credit (U.S. Code, title 44, sec. 150, p. 1939).

RECORD OFFICE AT THE CAPITOL

An office for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with Mr. Raymond F. Noyes in charge, is located in room H-112, House wing, where orders will be received for subscriptions to the RECORD at $1.50 per month or for single copies at 1 cent for eight pages (minimum charge of 3 cents). Also, orders from Members of Congress to purchase reprints from the RECORD should be processed through this office.

Look - May 21 '63
Suff South

THE SOUTH'S WAR AGAINST NEGRO VOTES

BY JOHN POPPY
LOOK SENIOR EDITOR

We have walked through the shadows of death,
We've had to walk all by ourselves;
But we'll never turn back, no, we'll never turn back
Until we've all been freed and we have equality.

That is part of a song Bertha Gober, a tense, fragile-looking girl of 21, composed not long ago for an organization known as the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. On paper, the song struck me as awkward, even a little pretentious. But it is a favorite of the student civil-rights movement in the toughest areas of the Deep South. To find out why, I asked Bertha to sing it. She looked around at her friends in the busy SNCC office in Atlanta and said, softly, "No." She is shy, I thought, because I am an outsider, the only white person here.

"Please," I said.

"Close the door," she said.

We sealed ourselves off from the others. Bertha began to sing hesitantly, hunched over, staring at the floor. Then, as if she had found a way to tell a painful secret, she relaxed and forgot me as her own words set to her own melody took over. She stood very straight, tilting her head back so she could sing upwards in a strong, rich voice that warmed and overflowed the little room. When she finished, the office on the other side of the door was still. No talk, no footsteps, no typewriter sounds. There were tears in her eyes, and I understood the power of her song—part lament, part prayer, part battle cry.

A few hours later, I was talking with James Forman, SNCC*'s executive secretary. Bertha Gober's song came up again. "You see why this is a singing movement? The songs help. Without them, it would be ugly," Forman said. "Ugly."*

The main job of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is to persuade frightened, reluctant Negroes to register and vote. It is concentrating on two bedrock segregationist areas where Negroes account for over 50 percent of the population: southwestern Georgia and the Delta country of Mississippi.

Occasionally, there is well-publicized violence—for instance, the disorders that began in Greenwood, Miss., in March. Until then, there had been just two or three lonely voter-registration workers in Greenwood. When a young Negro passing through town was shot, however, more workers moved in. Fire damaged the office they were using, and a shotgun blasted the windows of an SNCC man's house. Aroused and united, Negroes marched to the courthouse in protest; local police dispersed them, arresting some; the Department of Justice arrived on the scene, and so did dozens of reporters. National attention was suddenly focused on Greenwood.

But in the fight for Negro votes, explosions like this one are the exception rather than the rule. Terrible as it seems, the excitement will eventually pass. For the real story of the voter-registration struggle in the South, we must look behind the headlines to the grim, everyday reality. Why does Bertha Gober sing, We've had to walk all by ourselves?

James Forman knows. Because of what he has seen in the past two years, he is a bitter man. He and some other Negro leaders feel that voter-registration workers pay a needlessly high price, in mental and physical anguish, for the gains they make. One of the ironies of the struggle in the South is that these leaders direct much of their bitterness, not at their enemies the local segregationists, but at their friends in the Federal Government.

Forman knows that diehard whites will use all their muscle to prevent Negro voting. "They have a lot to lose," he says. But he is tortured by the thought that his people suffer even more than they have to, and he accuses the Kennedy Administration—particularly the Department of Justice—of not using all its muscle to protect SNCC voter-registration workers in the South.

Justice Department spokesmen vehemently disagree. The Department's overworked civil-rights staff has filed more than 35 voting suits under the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960, at least a dozen of them in defiant, unyielding Mississippi. During the past month and a half, it has taken legal action on behalf of the Negro demonstrators in Greenwood. But, says Burke Marshall, head of the Civil Rights Division, "I'm not running a police force."

An important suit, requesting an order barring discrimination against qualified Negroes who want to register, is now under way in Sunflower County, Miss. Sunflower is the home county of U. S. Sen. James O. Eastland, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy recently said that, although we still have a long way to go, "1962

continued

Negroes in Mississippi are "still scared" to vote, says James Forman, executive secretary of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. He is tortured by the thought that his people suffer more than they have to, and accuses the Kennedy Administration of not using all its muscle to protect SNCC voter-registration workers.

"All right, I'll go down to register, but what you going to do for me when they beat my head?"

was a year of great progress in civil rights." It was. But for the Negro on the front lines, the price was high.

One of the costs of that year of progress was a bleeding ulcer that nearly killed Forman this January. He had to send field secretaries into towns where he knew they might be killed. He saw seven SNCC fieldmen in Mississippi goaded by police harassment, lynch threats and beatings until they filed suit against Attorney General Kennedy and FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover in a desperate effort to get physical protection. He had to watch voter-registration workers not only in Mississippi but in Louisiana and southwestern Georgia driven to the edge of nervous breakdowns. He is constantly fighting the ugly suspicion that he and his people are alone, deserted by friends they had counted on.

"It is hard to describe the irony of the situation," Forman told me. "Voting is a constitutional right. We take time out of school, take all sorts of risks and try to register folks. When you get no help, that's pretty demoralizing. Take Mississippi. The Government has filed suits. OK. But people are still scared. They tell us, 'All right, I'll go down to register, but what you going to do for me when I lose my job and they beat my head?' And we can't do anything. The local folks are beginning to doubt that it's worth the risk."

Your name is Samuel Block. You are a Negro, 23 years old, born and raised in Mississippi. For the past year, you have been in the front lines of the voter-registration battle, as an SNCC field secretary.

Before all the help arrived in Greenwood last March, you and one or two others tried to cover all of Leflore County in the Mississippi Delta cotton country. Leflore's population is 65 percent Negro; almost all its voters are white. When you arrived last June in Greenwood, the county seat, you found a place to sleep, cheap as possible. Then you started knocking on doors, introducing yourself and your mission, trying to convince people who have never seen a ballot that it is their passport to freedom.

You found many of your own people afraid to talk to you because a police car followed you to each house, and the police parked in front, writing things down. They jailed you several times. Three white men beat you up, and you escaped being hit by a speeding pickup truck only because you jumped behind a telephone pole. One Thursday night last August, you barely got away from a group of whites armed with bricks, chains, ropes and pistols. You assume they meant to kill you, but you don't know for sure. You never know. You demanded protection from the Justice Department. You're not sure who it was you talked to in Washington, but you remember he said he couldn't move until a Federal statute was clearly violated. A reasonable answer, but it didn't make you feel any safer as night fell in Greenwood.

In the first six months, you managed to register five new voters.

Americans have read so much about lynchings, torture and murders that many of us, I suspect, are no longer troubled by an occasional atrocity. "There goes Mississippi again," we sigh, and move on after a moment's regret. But the possibility of death is only a part of the ordeal for men like Samuel Block. His enemy is ingenious; Block never knows where the next blow will fall. Perhaps someone to whom he talked will lose a job, or go to jail, or be dropped from the welfare rolls.

In cotton country, where almost all Negroes suffer from underemployment every winter, welfare and Government surplus food are important, not just for comfort, but for survival. Last October, the Leflore County Board of Supervisors discontinued a major part of the commodities program for 1963. As a result, more than 22,000 people who lived on surplus food in the winter were cut off. The total included Negroes and whites, but Block's people suffered most. Suspecting that his activities had caused the reprisal, Block suffered too. This spring, the departments of Justice and Agriculture managed to persuade Leflore County to start the program again—but it had been a hard winter there. And if your people are too cold and hungry to worry about a concept like the vote, no matter how important you tell them it is, you can't help wondering. . . .

If you are lynched, says Samuel Block, "you're dead, that's all." Dying takes courage. Living day by day, week in and week out for a year, with no relief in sight, under endless harassment, tests not only your courage, but your sanity.

I have been in many towns in Mississippi. I was in Greenwood before the recent upheaval there, and have been back since it began. The first time, I went to see Block because his troubles were—and are—commonplace by Mississippi standards. It was not easy to locate him. He was, to all appearances, in hiding. He moved constantly; his mail went to a friend, who passed it on to him; he had no telephone. Luckily, I met three young Negroes in Greenville, not far from Greenwood, who knew where Block might be the next day. They offered to guide me to the place.

The four of us drove the 54 miles from Greenville to Greenwood the next morning, with the radio turned up loud to blanket the tension in the car. Three Negro passengers and a white man at the wheel do not feel comfortable driving through the Delta country. The stares and angry mutters of people along the road provoked nudges and nervous laughter among my companions.

Near Greenwood, a sign pointing to "Business District" directs the traveler off U. S. Highway 82. "Go past that," said one of my passengers. The highway separates Negro from white. We turned onto a dirt temporary road and found ourselves on narrow streets among wooden, two-story buildings. My passengers relaxed; they were in familiar territory. Now, I was the outsider.

We met Block on a street corner in the Negro section of Greenwood and headed off for a sandwich, but we didn't get it. The waiter in the café said, "Police told me I'd have big trouble if they ever caught me serving a white man." Block told him, "Well, don't bother serving me either," and we left.

BLOCK WALKS in long strides. His movements are abrupt, and even when he is sitting still long enough to talk, you can feel the tension in him. "We're working hard toward voter registration," Block said, "but it is beginning to seem impossible. We've carried 80 or 90 people up to the courthouse, but only five of them got registered. . . ."

That was not surprising. Mississippi law requires each applicant for registration to read and write and to interpret in writing any section of the state constitution and write an explanation of the duties of a citizen. The state constitution has 285 sections, some of which are, in the words of a Mississippi lawyer, "extremely difficult, long and tedious." The registrar is the sole judge of whether or not an applicant has passed the test. The name of each applicant is listed for two weeks in the local paper, "so they know who you are," says Block.

When I saw him, Block was still doggedly taking people to the courthouse. (Most would not go by themselves.) He refused to admit despair, but his talk was angry. "In the state of Mississippi," he said at one point, "every animal has a season but the Negro; you can shoot him anytime." To understand some of his bitterness, follow Block's early progress in Greenwood in these excerpts from his reports to James Forman:

June 20, 1962: "On my arrival in Greenwood, everything seemed the same as in Parchman, Miss. [site of the state prison farm]. Negroes working hard for nothing, each waiting for the other to do something. . . . In a conversation with Greenwood's big [Negro] businessmen, I was told to sponsor anything I want. Where? None other than the big [Negro] Elks Club. . . ."

June 30: "I have cut my office and room rent very much. Office now $14 a month, living quarters $2.50 a week. . . ."

July 11: "We lost our meeting place at the Elks Club. The members did not approve of our meeting there and singing Freedom songs. They could have turned us off in a better way than they did, waiting until we were fixing to have a meeting, then telling us to have it in our office. . . ."

July 16 [from one of Block's temporary helpers]: "Say, are we supposed to work both day and night like Sam? Man, he doesn't even take time to eat now; I don't know what has gotten into him lately."

July 26: "In all my hard days of [voter] workshop recruiting, I was only able and glad to get six to attend from Greenwood. . . . By the way, I cannot send a budget for this week because I did not have any money to spend anyway. . . ."

August 11: "With things going bad for me in Greenwood, some of the citizens have asked me to protect myself and leave now because the

continued

LOOK 5-21-63 ELDON DEDINI

"Nonsense!"

Volunteers have received death threats

white people are planning to kill me. I replied, 'I am not leaving. . . .'

"Not more than a week ago, two Greenwood city policemen came to our office. I met them at the foot of the stairway and was told they were investigating an automobile theft. [One] voiced his opinion that I was a 'smart nigger from up North and if I didn't say Yes Sir and No Sir to him I would end up on the concrete without any teeth.' Last Friday, I took four Negroes to the county court in Greenwood. . . . I had given them instructions in how to register before we went. We arrived at about 2:30 p.m. and found a female deputy registrar, who acknowledged the presence of Negroes by asking me, 'What's for you, boy?' The four Negro applicants were frightened by the deputy registrar's attitude. . . .

"When I arrived home, I received a call from an individual who identified himself as speaking for the White Citizens Council. He told me, 'If you take anybody else up to register, you'll never leave Greenwood alive.' I get such calls with some frequency. About a week and a half ago, Miss ——, from who I rented a room for some time, told me that she received a similar call.

"Today, I took two Negroes to the registrar's office. The Negroes finished filling out the application form and the literacy and citizenship tests . . . and left the office. Two policemen were waiting just outside the courthouse. They said something to me, but I just ignored them, got into a taxi and took the applicants home. The police followed, stopping in front of the homes of the applicants and sat writing something. . . ."

Ironically, the recent incidents in Greenwood have proved more effective than all Block's persuasion. Since the beginning of March, hundreds of aroused Negroes have tried to register there; few have passed the tests, of course, but at least they tried.

But Block and others like him do not want to depend on violence for results. He pretends to see hope in the Justice Department's suit to open the voter rolls in Senator Eastland's Sunflower County, which borders Leflore County on the west. "Maybe if the Justice Department wins the suit over there, things will ease off here in Leflore," he says. But he doesn't really believe that. The Department, he knows, has had to work county by county in its tedious, expensive effort to break down 150 years of tradition in a defiant state.

As lawyers fight their battles in court, lonely young people will continue to struggle for voter registration in less public places. Block and his companions are outnumbered. SNCC and other groups like it are small, and they do not seem to attract many new recruits. That means there is little prospect of relief for the field secretaries. They have been at their posts for over a year now, and will try to stay there indefinitely, despite the inevitable battle fatigue that makes some weep—and sing—in anguish. For them, the voter-registration movement is an endless, nerve-racking series of guerrilla battles in dark corners of the Black Belt. In many ways, it is like underground warfare in an occupied country. To have to think in such terms of American citizens on their own soil is, as James Forman says, ugly. END

BUTCH

"I like that Captain O'Rourke. He never forgets the citations and promotions he gets apprehending Butch."

Preferred in 67 countries around the world . . .

Motorists everywhere agree – Valvoline Motor Oil provides the ultimate in lubrication protection. For almost a century, Valvoline has been world-famous for unsurpassed quality. And today, when you use Valvoline in your car, you get the advantages of miracle Chemaloy – an exclusive development of advanced research. Valvoline makes sure your engine stays clean, resists wear, delivers top power. Result? Longer engine life, savings on gas and repairs. So change now to Valvoline – symbol of quality since 1866. Ask for it at service stations, garages, new car dealers.

VALVOLINE OIL COMPANY, Freedom, Pa.
Division of Ashland Oil & Refining Company

During a Negro voter registration drive in Greenwood, Miss., police attempt to disperse marchers.

Inquiry Into the Mississippi Mind

Racial conflict has made this Southern state the symbol of uncompromising resistance to change. Herewith, an examination of Mississippi's plight, the causes and the outlook.

By CLAUDE SITTON

JACKSON, Miss.

WHEN Mississippi Negroes gather to discuss their struggle for equality, as they frequently do, one story they tell concerns a plantation field hand named John. Seized by civil rights fever, he pays a visit to the big house to proclaim the new order.

"Mister Charlie," he says to the white planter, "all these years you and Miss Ann has called me 'John.' That's all right. But things is changed. There ain't gonna be no more 'Mister Charlie' and 'Miss Ann.' It's just 'Ann' and 'Charlie' now. And, Charlie, one other thing: Ain't gonna be no more Mississippi, either. From now on, it's just 'Sippi.' "

Mississippi whites see little humor in the story. Mister Charlie and Miss Ann quickly lose the graciousness and warmth with which they are rightfully credited if one suggests that racial customs must be modified. They know that change is inevitable. But the mind boggles at the thought—and sometimes slips its moorings to reality.

This irrational reaction partially explains some of the shocking events of the past year: The bloody riots over a Negro's admission to the University of Mississippi, the continued denial of minority voting rights—dramatized by recent violence in the Delta—and the harassment, intimidation and force employed against the whites who dare dissent from segregationist orthodoxy. Perhaps the most damaging effects, however, of this state of mind are being felt in other areas of public life.

IN the current emotional atmosphere the unscrupulous have virtual immunity so long as they act in the name of segregation. Charlatans who would be laughed off the streets in normal times find a receptive audience. History is rewritten, substituting pleasing fiction for unpleasant fact. And the Mississippian, who bows to no man in loyalty to country, lends encouragement or stands by silently while his public officials flirt with sedition.

The extent to which these developments have tried the patience of persons outside the state is apparent in a recent recommendation of the Civil Rights Commission. The commissioners pointed out that Mississippi paid only $270,000,000 in taxes into the Federal Treasury during the 1962 fiscal year, while receiving $650,000,000 in return. They urged President Kennedy to determine if he had legal authority to withhold this aid until Mississippi ended its "subversion of the Constitution." (The President said he did not have such power.)

The day of the commission's proposal, a state official suggested that Mississippi might retaliate in kind. Fred Ross, State Commissioner of Public Welfare, said: "The question now arises as to how much longer the white population of Mississippi will continue to consent to be taxed and drained of its sustenance for the benefit of a race and nation which show no appreciation for their sacrifices, in order to destroy itself by integration."

Can Mississippi afford its uncompromising position on race? What social debits has it incurred by its intransigency? What factors underlie the refusal to face reality? Is there basis for hope that the state will heed the few courageous leaders who are urging a return to sanity? These questions can be examined but not firmly answered.

To understand Mississippi's interracial conflict, one must first consider the nature of the state and its people. Despite its monolithic image, Mississippi is a mosaic.

THE Gulf Coast gives it a touch of Florida. Salt marshes and piney woods alternate with groves of moss-draped live oaks and stretches of sandy beach. Mansions of fading elegance compete with plush motels for attention along U.S. Route 90. The coast already has shipbuilding, papermaking and fishing industries, and soon will have a $125 million oil refinery and a $400 million testing center for moon rocket engines.

To the north lie cut-over timberlands, small farms and a succession of dusty county-seat towns. Deserted fields and empty storefronts tell of the loss of population to the state's small but growing cit- (Continued on Page 104)

CLAUDE SITTON is Southern Correspondent for The New York Times, based in Atlanta.

CATIONAL

of The Performing Arts

LERNY"

County

ew Hope, Penna.
sfying—Summer
ENT COURSE
ugust 25th
nagers ressional Courses
na, Art, Voice, heatre Perform-
dult Supervision,
Beautiful Campus

-1963
E LIMON
ter classes
B HAMILTON
TA & HARI
KI ARKIN
URY GOTSCHALKS
RENE APINEE
OHN LEHNE advanced workshop
RENATA MANNHARDT
ROBINSON STONE
IRWIN STAHL
GRETA HARTWIG
FRED STEELE
BETTYE MAZOR

T WAIT! ACT NOW!
ERFORM SOON!
t easy—here you are trained tioned—and Discovered!
OU ARE LOOKING FOR IVITY—THIS IS YOUR ANSWER

blerny student has either a interest in the Arts as a ng Cultural Experience or has Theatre as a Career—Courses
h are offered.

TUITION $795
Includes room & board
Open for Inspection
Brochure on request
call, collect or write—
rence Snyderman, Director
New Hope, (215) 862-2022,
(NYC tel: YU 8-6510)

IP WOODLAND, INC.
Phoenicia, N.Y.
ar of erracial, Intercultural Co-educational Camping
enced, professional staff. All sports, e, music, drama, trips. Suitable work ts for all children. Ages 6 to 14. Spe-raining Programs for a limited and group of High School students.
or eight week periods.
Phone for appointment:
SARA ABRAMSON, Director
way, N.Y.C. 3. AL 4-2526
ember American Camping Ass'n.

the Berkshires Near Tanglewood
OY A FUN FILLED PROGRAM:
D & WATER SPORTS • ARTS
USIC • SCIENCE • TRIPS
chulman, 16 Bronson Av.,
dale, N. Y. SC 3-1485, chulman, 240 W. Post Rd.,
Plains, N. Y. RO 1-3233
$650—Coed—6-15 yrs.

MARAC
AMP • Nicholson, Pa.
stern & English riding daily
ewish-American Chuckwagon
Weekly Rodeos • All Sports
Resident M.D. & R.N.
Moderate Fee
Foreman: Dick Krebs
957 71 Ave., Phila. 38, Pa.
4-8273. In NY: MU 7-9000

N Blairstown, N.J.
Coed—3-14 yrs.
0 • 4 Wks. $185.00
d cabins, modern sanitary nurse, experienced staff,
swimming, riding, crafts,
R. Gerkhardt, Box T. or phone CApitol 6-8100

The Mississippi Mind

(Continued from Page 13)

ies — Pascagoula, Gulfport, Hattiesburg, Meridian, Jackson, Vicksburg and Greenville.

The rolling hills that extend northward from the Gulf coastal plain are broken on the east by stretches of Black Belt prairie and on the west by the Delta. This football-shaped expanse of level fields of sandy loam and buckshot clay reaches 200 miles from Vicksburg to Memphis, one of the richest cotton-growing areas in America.

MISSISSIPPI was settled by planters and slaves from the worn-out farms of the southern Piedmont. Streaming into the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw at the beginning of the 19th century, they built an empire on cotton. The state became one of the nation's richest. But much of its wealth was wiped out by the Civil War, subsequent depressions and the boll weevil.

With the coming of agricultural mechanization, cotton production remained profitable only in the Delta. Even there, the tractor, the mechanical picker and chemicals have slashed the need for labor. As a result, hundreds of thousands of Mississippians have migrated to the North and Middle West.

Negroes, who once outnumbered whites, now make up only 43 per cent of the state's population of 2,178,141, according to the Bureau of the Census. They are in the majority in the Delta counties, but more and more are leaving because they have no work for eight or nine months a year.

Mississippians are still a largely rural people. Only 38 per cent live in urban areas. Most of the state's manufacturing jobs are in scattered, small textile and apparel plants. Jackson, the capital, is the state's largest city. It has a population of 150,000, a jet airport under construction, and one of the nation's few gold-plated bathrooms. This last was installed in the Governor's mansion at a cost of $10,000 by Gov. Ross R. Barnett.

MISSISSIPPI is the poorest state in the nation and some residents considered the Governor's expenditure excessive in view of a shortage of funds for education and other state services. The state had a per capita income in 1961 of only $1,229, compared with a national average of $2,263. The median annual family income of its whites was $4,209, and of its Negroes, $1,444.

The state has the third highest illiteracy rate—4.9 per cent —in the nation, trailing only South Carolina and Louisiana. A total of 32,196 of its Negroes and 8,444 of its whites have never attended school. A far larger number, 119,741 Negroes and 40,274 whites, are considered functional illiterates.

Mississippi offers a study in contrasts, especially in the Delta. Greek-revival mansions and rambling ranch houses in groves of shade trees look out on weather-beaten rows of clapboard cabins and tar-paper shacks, most of which have open privies and some of which lack even running water. A planter dressed in expensive Western boots and hat gets up from a leisurely meal in a restaurant and displays a rare dime valued at $90 from his coin collection. Less than a mile away, a Negro mother arises and prepares a breakfast of sugar syrup and hoecake for her children, some of whom cannot attend school because they have no shoes.

OLD MISSISSIPPI — Negroes pick

The state's campaign for economic expansion has reached a promising stage. The International Paper Company plant whose towering smokestack dominates the tidewater town of Moss Point, the cargo ships and nuclear submarines on the ways in the Ingalls Shipyard in Pascagoula and the Standard Oil refinery under construction at Bayou Casotte offer impressive evidence of progress.

BUSINESS experts see no evidence that segregation has hampered such industrial growth. Continuing racial unrest is another thing indeed. A leading financial economist in the Southeast predicts that Mississippi's number of new plant acquisitions will begin to decline at midyear. "It will continue shrinking for a long time to come, until and unless the state shows that it is willing to rejoin the Union," he says.

High as is the economic cost of intransigency, the social cost is higher. A thumbnail sketch of what white supremacy means in Mississippi is provided in a current report of the state advisory committee to the Federal Civil Rights Commission. It should be noted that its members are Mississippians.

"The committee's investigations have indicated that in all important areas of citizenship, a Negro in Mississippi receives substantially less than his due consideration as an American and as a Mississippian. This denial extends from the time he is denied the right to be born in a nonsegregated hospital, through his segregated and inferior school years and his productive years when jobs for which he can qualify are refused, to the day he dies and is laid to rest in a cemetery for Negroes only."

Further, Negroes frequently are denied the most effective

cotton by hand in the Delta.

recourse from these wrongs—the ballot. The extreme to which disfranchisement goes and the irrational behavior of some whites when confronted by a mere attempt to remedy the situation have just been underscored in Leflore County in the Delta.

MORE than 95 per cent of the county's whites 21 years of age and older are registered, but less than 2 per cent of its Negroes. State law gives voter registrars almost sole discretion in saying who may and who may not vote.

The Justice Department recently instituted a Federal Court action against registrars in Leflore and six other Mississippi counties. But even under reasonable regulations fairly applied, the ignorance and impoverishment of many Leflore County Negroes would preclude their registration. Thus, it would appear that, with the cards so patently stacked in favor of white political supremacy, the registration campaign started there last August would have caused no stir. Not so. Campaign workers have been threatened, harassed, beaten and shot.

Such terrorism has not been restricted to Leflore County or to the Delta. The Voter Education Project, an Atlanta-based organization financed by national foundations, has issued a list of 64 separate acts of violence and intimidation directed against Negroes since January, 1961, in more than a dozen counties. Virtually all of these incidents were related to registration activities.

THE corrosive effects of racism on whites as well as Negroes are shown even more clearly in the story of Mississippi's resistance to desegregation in education. The last chapter has yet to be written about this phase of the struggle. But it already has brought the entire state to the brink of rebellion against the Federal Government.

The action came last Sept. 13, when Governor Barnett invoked the legally discredited doctrine of interposition. He announced that he was placing the power of the state between the University of Mississippi and the Federal Courts to prevent the admission of James H. Meredith, a 29-year-old Negro. It is doubtful that Mr. Barnett, a shrewd damage-suit lawyer, thought interposition would work for him more than it had for Gov. Jimmy H. Davis of Louisiana in his efforts to block Negroes from the New Orleans public schools.

Nevertheless, like demagogues before him, Governor Barnett apparently felt compelled to stage a show of defiance while negotiating a surrender under the table. If such was his intention, he misjudged the mood of his people with fatal results.

GIVEN the Governor's refusal to preserve order and the Kennedy Administration's decision to enforce desegregation initially with Federal deputy marshals rather than with troops, the riots of Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 on the Ole Miss campus and in the adjoining town of Oxford were inevitable. One might have thought that the death of two men and the incalculable damage to the state and nation would have had a sobering effect on segregationists. Any such illusions were soon dispelled by declarations of the type made by a Jackson newspaper columnist:

"Watch the peace-lovers come to the fore, grab a nigger-neck and start bellowing brotherly love," he wrote. "For us . . . we'll just go on being a bigot, a reactionary, a rebel and lick our wounds till the next fight starts and plan to win somehow. We are licked but not beaten!"

Some Mississippians believe that the rest of the nation is on their side and that succor cannot be long in coming. "I

(Continued on Following Page)

CO-EDUCATION

CAMP SASKATCHE
On Schroon
ADIRONDACK,
BOYS-GIRLS (
We offer your Chil
ARTS Music, Dancing, and Dramatics.
LAND All Sports, includ nis, Physical Golf, Trampolin, WATER All Phases incl ing, Sailing ING expertly
FEE $650
CRAFTS Construction, Ceramics, Phot Stagecraft, Pic
CULTURAL Typing, L Study: Spanish, Russian, Colle Preparation, Journalism TEEN-AGERS (13-17) Part Scholarships to qualified te
SCIENCE PROGRAM
Experimentation & res well equipped Labs by SOL FELDMAN, "Techniques & Investig Life Sciences." $50 addi for Science Program.
Write or Phone for our Book "Your Child at Camp"
PETER LIEFF, Dir.—HI 5-2557 162-41 Powells Cove Blvd. Beechu ★★★ Member American Camping

AMHERST M C
Coed, age 12-20. 8 MUSIC STUDY, Ju 25, in Sebago L Raymond, Maine. der noted musician instruments. Ac Orchestra, band ceptionally bea facilities. ¼ beach. Swimmin nis, archery. Br
Dr. J. Clem
Box 102, Mo

CAMP STAR LAKE
A super girls 6 sports, at Remedial len free. served. Special co-ed Canada, Sha gram, travelli Thousand Isla Phone OX 7 Directors: E 342 Madison Dr. Tassy S 4901 Van Victor 5-7
Duane, N. Y. Est. 1946

BET-CHEN
Horseback R
75 miles fr. N. Y.
• Olympic Pool
• Modern Cabins
• Fully Equipped
• Jewish Am. Cuisine
• Registered Nurse
Camp Bet-Chen, 1095 2d A Call anytime P

Coed 7-13 JOSED
CRAZY 'B
This is it! Berkshire H acre pvt. es you in the summer. An c (over 100 head cattle an camper receives calf to etc. Horseback riding dai rides, swimming, fairs. $500 2 months.
Mr. and Mrs. E.H. Madsen, H

HILLTO
BOYS 5-16
HILL MA
GIRLS 5-16
Two separate camps. Complete RI gram—camp owned horses. Matu ship. Excellent swimming, boatin fishing. Trips. Tennis, riflery, All sports. Crafts, dancing. Prot. services at camp. 8 wks. $650.
H. T. HILLMAN, 8618 110th S Richmond Hill 18, N. Y. • VI 9

GREEN CHIMNEY
Coed 2-12 years. Permanent buildi riding and swimming. Sports. 75 Non-sectarian. Resident physician Also, winter boarding school. Bro Director
S. B. Ross, Jr., M. A., Brewster, N.Y.

CAMP ETON Rhinebeck 2 hrs. from Co-ed. 4-16. Deluxe cabins. Pvt. l filtered swimming pool. All sports. musi crafts. Exp. staff. Res. Dr. & Nurse Kosher. JACK ABOFF, 193 Shelley Elizabeth, N. J. 5-0170. N. Y. ph. M ouncement

EDUCATIONAL

it of Shaker Village age boys and girls is g established. Additionngs are expected to be for next summer for e 14 to 17, girls 13 to 16.

Shaker Village program des opportunities that foster th and confidence of the scent through educationally ed work experiences, comty life and profitable use of e.

enrollment information, state s of next July, present school Write Registrar

haker Village
WORK GROUP
ox 1149CT, Pittsfield, Mass.
N. Y. Phone LO 4-5850

MPS ST. REGIS
n Shelter Island Sound
EAST HAMPTON, L. I.

Camps for Boys, Girls 5-ater swimming, sailing, al
Riding. Medical Staff. Jesuit
. Mature staff, including.
nnedy, Director of Ath-
St. Peter's College. Fee
tion Plan. Write or or Catalogue. Frank ams (Formerly Fordketball Coach). 1594
tan Avenue, Bronx me: UN 3-8630.

st Camps
MI for BOYS for GIRLS

Valparaiso Univ-
Season. Ages 6-17.
atop the Pocono.
Beach. Spotrs and tivity Riding Tenienced Councelors.
Church Services.
0—8 Weeks $325
et "TC" N. Y. Office
st 42nd St. LO 5-1550

h-a-Naim
ys & girls, 4-18
N.Y. • 85 mi—NYC pools; all sports;
ke; horseback rid-premises; modern ; trained staff; doc-
rse.
A. Jacobson, B. Gann
ry Laws observed
32d St., Bklyn., N. Y.
ES 2-1296
-0928 - VI 6-3379
CY 8-7783
JR 34th YEAR

t HILL
, N.H. Boys & Girls 6-15 encouraged to develop nsible person. Interna-
DAILY RIDING, sports, supplied. Work program.
- wife owners - directors.
Write
Robinson Placzek, Director
W. 87 St., New York City
Tel. TR 4-7679

ED-RO
Kerhonkson, N. Y.
90 mi. from NYC
$460-8 Wks;
$245-4 Wks.
d 6-16
ympic Pool • Hikes & Trips
Bunks • Camper Workers
a. Cuisine • CIT Program
Dramatics • Tchr. Trained Staff
s, Dancing • Tutoring Available
TISCH, Asst. Princ. NYC. Jr. H.S. orm Relig. Sch. 922 Cleveland St. np., N. Y. IVanhoe 1-3673

KENDALE
So. Windham
Connecticut
d 6-15. 27th Season. Pvt. Lake
All Land & Water Sports
Tennis, Trips, Sailing, Music,
Nature, Dramatics, Crafts.
PYramid 1-5810, Mitchell Strauss nridge Ave., North Woodmere, N.Y.

NE TRAIL
co-ed
7-14
Bush, N. Y. 70 miles from N. Y. C. program geared to the interests of the al campers. Limited enrollment 4. 8
A.C.A. member.
Dr., Brentwood, L.I., N.Y. BR 3-9785

(Continued from Preceding Page)

found a lot of sympathy in the Midwest for our position, particularly in regard to our respect for states' rights and the Tenth Amendment," said one returning missionary.

What underlies this refusal of white Mississippians to face reality? Undoubtedly, the heritage of slavery, the stark poverty and profound isolation that Mississippi has known have played a part. Another important factor has been the fear of the Negro felt by what until recently was a white minority.

THERE is also bitter resentment against the North. This was first aroused by abolitionism and reinforced by the North's failure to follow a consistent racial policy, either in its demands made upon the South or in its handling of the problem in its own backyard. In a word, Mississippians consider Northerners hypocritical.

The genesis of the current agony, of course, lies in the school-desegregation decision of the Supreme Court. Dr. C. Vann Woodward, an authority on the history of the post-Civil War South, has written that Mississippi came forward in 1954 "in her historic role as leader of reaction in race policy, just as she had in 1875 to overthrow Reconstruction and in 1890 to disfranchise the Negro."

Significantly, many of the state's present leaders—Governor Barnett, House Speaker Walter Sillers and Senator James O. Eastland—grew up in the climate of reaction created by those earlier benchmarks of Southern democracy. And they served their political apprenticeships in the school of Senators James K. Vardaman, "The Great White Chief," who advocated repeal of the 15th Amendment as the first step toward saving Anglo-Saxon civilization, and Theodore G. Bilbo, known as "The Man," who plumbed the depths of demagoguery.

Raw material from this background combined with the catalyst of the court's desegregation ruling to touch off a racial conflagration. The first alarm was sounded in the Delta county of Sunflower, home of Senator Eastland, in the summer of 1954 when the first Citizens Council was founded. This was the initial step toward institutionalized bigotry in a more or less respectable setting.

There followed a campaign of indoctrination with few parallels in American history. The results have been described by Dr. James W. Silver, professor of history at the University of Mississippi, in The New Mexico Electric News: "Most organizations and individuals (press, pulpit, politicians, patriots, philosophers) capable of influencing public opinion are militantly arrayed in the indoctrination process. A never-ceasing propagation of the 'true faith' goes on day after day. The constant demand, particularly in emergencies, for a united front requires that potential nonconformists and dissenters from the accepted code be kept under wraps, squelched, or, in extreme cases, run out of the community."

WHAT happens to those who dissent is shown by the case of Ira Harkey, editor and publisher of The Chronicle at Pascagoula. Harkey who resembles a low-key Jimmy Cagney, holds that the rights of every man should be protected, "whether he be white, black, yellow, green or shades in between." One of his most biting editorial commentaries on the Mississippi scene followed publication of a letter from a relative of Governor Barnett who is a missionary in Africa. She criticized Mississippians for sending persons to minister to Negroes abroad and then undercutting the missionaries by mistreating Negroes at home. To this, The Chronicle said:

"In Mississippi, a person who attempts to carry Christianity out the church door, who dares to practice the Christian virtue of tolerance outside the church, is cursed as a liberal, a leftist, a Communist, a Niggerlover. Christ was the greatest champion of the underdog the world has ever known. If He were to visit us here, now, by whose side would He stand, beside the brick-throwing, foul-mouthed,

(Continued on Following Page)

PICTURE CREDITS

1—Calogero Cascio from Rapho-Guillumette
9—Marc Riboud from Magnum
10-11—The New York Times (Tames, Burns, Orris); AP; Camera Press, Dalmas and Baldev from Pix; European; UPI; Pictorial Parade; CBS-TV; China Photo Service
13—United Press International
14-15—UPI; National Science Foundation; Drawing by Walter Hortens
16—General Dynamics
18—Dalmas-Pix
19—The New York Times (Sam Falk)
20—Drawing by Walter Einsel
24-25—Crispian Woodgate
34—Cinema Studios
39—Culver Pictures
40—Fred Fehl
42-50—Drawings by Arnold Genkins
52—Lew Merrim from Monkmeyer
62—Steve Schapiro from Black Star
64—George Zimbel
69—Henri Dauman
70—Associated Press
72-79—Drawings by Roy Doty
82—Fritz Garo
89—Eve Hoffmann; Suzanne Szasz; Jack Manning
90—The New York Times (Sam Falk)
92—Drawing by Alice Golden
100—Bettmann Archive
101—Culver Pictures
108-109—Talon, Inc.
111-112—Ben Roth Agency
114-115—Sovfoto

NEW MISSISSIPPI — Factories like this are springing up.

destroying, profaning, slavering members of the mob and their 'nice-folk' eggers-on, or beside the trembling victim of their hate?"

Harkey's rewards have included a bullet through The Chronicle's front door, a shotgun blast through his office window, an advertising boycott, "hate" mail and social ostracism.

Other dissenters who have broken the silence imposed by fear or expediency have received similar treatment. Among them are Methodist ministers who have lost their pulpits, students who have been hounded out of the University of Mississippi for befriending James Meredith, and faculty members such as G. Ray Kerciu, an assistant professor of art who was threatened with penalties totaling seven months' imprisonment and $600 in fines for a painting inspired by the Ole Miss riots.

There is no ready panacea for the social ills that afflict Mississippi. But there is hope. The pressure on Mr. Harkey has been eased since Claude Ramsay, the bluff president of the state A.F.L.-C.I.O., and a handful of others came to his support. The charges against Mr. Kerciu have been dropped.

AND there are other harbingers of a new day: voting applicants standing patiently at the courthouse door in Greenwood for hour on endless hour, a Justice Department attorney shaking hands with a Negro while a white woman shivers with rage, the songs of freedom rolling out of the little Negro churches into the blackness of the Delta night, and a white man, trapped by a system he inherited, smiling sadly and saying, "We would like to be more responsible than we can afford to be."

Sitting in his modernistic office overlooking Jackson, a prominent lawyer spoke of the state's responsible citizens and their weariness with racism and its fruits. "The human mind can accept just so much of this type of thing, then it seeks relief," he said.

Former Congressman Frank Smith of Greenwood gave voice to the sentiments of this group as he left office. "We cannot isolate ourselves from the rest of the United States any more than the United States can isolate itself from the world. . . . Our racial problems are going to remain for years to come. But the most certain thing about them is that any remedies based on hate will merely aggravate the problems instead of simplifying them."

IT is questionable that Mississippians are yet prepared to heed the advice of Mr. Smith, now a director of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The state will elect a new Governor next fall, and it now appears that another member of the Vardaman-Bilbo school will succeed Barnett.

The most effective influence could be exerted by industrialists and financiers outside the state, although they are traditionally hesitant to become involved in such matters. Indeed, concern over the possible harmful effects of the controversy already has led some prominent Mississippi businessmen to exert pressure for moderation.

It seems evident that Mississippi cannot long delay some compromise with the legitimate demands of its Negro citizens. The hazards of the present situation are implicit in the mounting evidence of widespread bitterness. In the crowded sanctuary of a Negro church one warm spring night, a speaker at a voter registration rally referred with sarcasm to "the good white people." A voice from the audience shouted: "They ain't no good! None of them!"

CO-EDUCATIONAL

NAVAJO Boys & Ages 5-
Poconos, 100 Miles N.Y.C. 47
Honesdale, Pa. Approved
SUMMER CAMP
Comprehensive Program for All Interests Activities Famous S Clinics for All Land & Lake Sports. Horseback Riding, Skiing, Sailing, Golf, Tennis, R Archery, Drama, Dance, Choral, Guitar, Roller Skating. cial Sciences, Labs, Shops, Art, Crafts, Pioneering Trips, S Events for the Beginner, Inte iate & Advanced Camper, Trainee & Work Camp.
SUMMER SCHOO
(Optional)
On the Premises, Full Home Credit, Licensed All Subjects, 1-12, Repeat, Advance, Tutor; R Preview, Rem & Dev Reading, Sciences, Languages, etc., Prep ditionals, Advance College Place Scholastic Aptitudes, College En Exam Review, Official August C Boards, Typing, PLUS Camp Pro
H. T. FEDERMAN, Dir.
135 Eastern Pkwy, B'klyn 38,
Phone Area Code 212-STerling3

LAKE FAIRLEE CAMP
Ely, Vermont
Boys-Girls: 7-14+
A Unique atmosphere and environ All Athletics and Aquatics: T softball, Swimming, Water-skiing plus optional instruction by p sional artists in the Fine Arts. chores, visiting faculty. Dietary Outstanding staff for Creative Pro
Fee: $675. for 8 weeks
Write/Phone: Herb Kummel,
408 West 57th St., New Yor
JUdson 6-5710

UNDER-ACHIEVE
CHILDREN 7 to Vernon,
Unique design to accelerate so tional and academic development. and small group techniques. in reading, speech, science, soci Full recreation, athletic, cultur Spacious quarters on 30 acres lake. Dr. M. Kaufman, Psych Hilton Ave., Hempstead, N. IV 1-7713.
GARFIELD CAMP SC

IF YOU ARE . . .
16-18 YEARS
Have a wonderfu
Co-ed
WORK
Fee $175
Write for in American Jewish Room 1516, 120 Bro

CHI
You
Co-ed 6-15
Fe
An unfor rected b winner work
Box

CAMP BEAUM
Hopewell, N.J.
For the child of telligence and assistance in ord personal growth, a happy summe program, profes
Dr. GERALD
Executive Dire

Job's Po
Teenagers: Varied
forestry, riding, 400 acres with 50 imagination & in sume responsibilit summer, phone
H. T. Jayson, 49 V

NEW CHILD
Write for
New York St
Box 723, Ans

Gir
-17.
7th Yr.
d

l Ages,
Sports
Water
Water
Riflery,
Music,
. Spe-
Radio,
Special
ermed-
Teen,

OL

School Grades
Review,
Math,
p Con-
ement, ntrance College
ogram.

N. Y.
3-2217

nment.
Tennis
g, et profe
Tr
l o

EXPE
DI
TUIT

Nothing
Finer
BETTE

New Republic 5/18/63

LWD ✓
PA ✓
ML ✓
(Copy to VEP) ✓
SDB ✓

Jack Chatfield

Suff. South

Letter to a Northern Friend

A white student who has gone South to work with Negroes on voter registration tells of fear and inertia and of the children who are disturbing the peace in rural Georgia.

Leesburg, Georgia

Robert Kennedy is on the late news, speaking of the 15th Amendment ("I think I understand," says a lady, "'cepting, what is 'servitude'?"). Agnew James, day laborer and chairman of the Lee County voter registration movement (over 80 Negro registrants in 11 months in this predominantly black county, classified as "100 percent rural" in the census) rarely, if ever, has occasion to mention the 15th Amendment.

"Other words," says Agnew James, "so many folks is scared. Last week a boy got knocked in the head with a shovel and you can't get anybody to tell you that they know anything about it." Still, what is called simultaneously "the movement" and "that mess" by Negroes living a hundred feet apart on some eternally dusty road in south Georgia is progressing, in the words of one man, "like a picker in his tenth hour and his hundredth pound."

We were in Bronwood, in Terrell County, last week at the home of a man who showed us his hogs and whose wife fed us. The man leaned against the rail.

"What can I do about the United States?" he said. "Nothin', by myself. You know how many people have registered in this little town. Two: my daughter and my granddaughter."

Earlier, we had sat with a Dawson man on the steps of his two-room home. He was back for supper and was eating from a pan, watching the sun go down. His wife was somewhere in the darkness of her bedroom. She washes her clothes in an iron pot in the back yard and presses them with an iron heated by fire. Her daughter misses a day of school each week so that she can help. No one reprimands her for this; when there are electric irons and automatic washers, there will be better school attendance.

The man spent most of his time chewing; this was a sign of his utter disbelief in what we were trying to tell him. We were talking about the power of the ballot in a county where one party – the blacks – outnumbers the other party – the whites. He was chewing and looking away.

"If I go, fifty on that block won't go. If one over there goes, that'll still be fifty more that don't go. . ."

Still earlier, an ancient head spoke to us from the porch of his home: "I just come up from Florida. I said 'Yes' and 'No' down there."

It is a mark of caste here to know history well enough to lose hope and to believe that social change or the student movement, though it be seated at the doorstep, is as remote as Robert Kennedy or a street skirmish in the Congo. "Immediacy," in Southern rural dialect, is what makes you harrow well into the night to obliterate a day of rain and a faulty bottom-plow; "social change" is when you move to Tampa. This makes the creeping revolution in southwest Georgia the conjunction of the very few who have rebelled without reserve and the many who sit in spasmodic attendance upon the few.

"His bossman didn't worry him none," said one of the few at a weekly mass meeting last Saturday night. "Fact about it, he took his bossman's truck down there and registered."

Agnew James stood up, amid the residual laughter and applause.

"There are two things I ain't afraid of," he said. "And that's bossmen and jobs."

Agnew James is one of the symbols of unflinching insurrection and a measure of how close a man may come to becoming a total stranger to his history and the despairing dialectic of his kind. He rents a few acres and works nights sweeping alleys at a mill in Albany, 11 miles away. He has been fired once and now he is being boycotted and can get neither tractor oil nor heating gas. Last summer his was one of four Lee County homes shot into at night by men in a fast moving car.

"The chil'ren were in there," says Agnew James, who, by his own account, had no time to fire back.

Since the coming of the students to Lee County last June, his life – and the life of the few who are, yet, too many to enumerate – has been patterned in absolute allegiance to that ideology which must be the beginning of social revolution: the ideology that a crooked rod can be made straight. Agnew James, who is the embodiment of the movement and the simplicity of its doctrine, believes it is foolish, even laughable, to fear greatly. He chairs the Lee County mass meetings each Saturday night with what are mostly colorful insertions and calls for remarks and reports from the floor. One night Agnew James called for the report from the Leesburg voting district and the Leesburg delegation, a woman, stood up.

"I asked one lady would she register and vote and she said 'No' and I didn't ask nobody else."

"Let's give her a hand," said Agnew James, who understands that a year ago, the elective franchise was as far from this lady's mind as $100 a week and a lawn sprinkler.

The strength of Agnew James, and of this woman, and of the rest, is the strength of consciousness; they are not deluded. They have the courage to carry hope into the desolation of the Southern rural Negro community; a grand act of calculated mockery levelled against any who believe it will never be changed.

An Army of Children

But much of the movement's strength lies in its innocence; in short, its children.

At a Thursday night mass meeting in Americus (Sumter County), a preacher rose to tell the gathered 300 that some of his congregation were pressing him: they wanted the meeting held at their church. The minister had been speaking calmly; suddenly he grew exuberant and raised his arm.

"Several children," he said, "have asked me. Do you hear me? The children! The children are asking if we can have the meetings there."

Each county has its small army of children. It is the habit of five young girls from the Lee County high school – four of them ninth graders, one a senior – to devote two half days and one full day each week to voter registration. Last week in home economics class they extended their conspiracy to include the brazen declaration of it on their clothing. Three of them wrote "FREEDOM" on pinkish headbands; two wrote it on black sashes which they wear pinned to their blouses. And on Saturday morning, four of them walked into the county courthouse in Leesburg to inquire why the aging registrar had closed shop 45 minutes before the appointed time, which was 12 o'clock. The girls were wearing their headbands and sashes, and in what can only be termed an historic encounter, received a civil answer and left.

At the meeting that night they rose, self-consciously, and told of the events of the day. James Mays, a farmer who was fired last year from a teaching job at the Lee County Negro high school for a protracted breach of the peace, spoke from the rear of the Antioch Baptist Church: "Five years ago, maybe two years ago, they would've taken a switch and strapped them out of the office. Negro children wouldn't have done this in an office as important as this two years ago."

One of the girls began talking about the sashes and headbands.

"Some of the children saw us and came up and said, 'What you doing wearing that mess?' (Laughter and loud hand clapping.) One of the teachers told us that the principal better not see us or we'd be in trouble." (More laughter and hand clapping.)

And then, giggling, they returned to their seats. The Albany contingent, also children, began a song. Three girls from Albany, customarily present, were absent; they were in the city jail for picketing a white merchant. One, age 16, was in for her seventh time ("I ain't never going to jail with my mother again, all she did was nag and nag."). And another, age 11, was asked not long ago why she had not picketed and risked arrest with her 15-year-old sister that afternoon.

"I'm going tomorrow," she said. "I couldn't go today on account of I had to go to music."

The truce, then, has been shattered, and there is a great deal to tell. All of it cannot possibly be told here. There is, recalling the words of James Mays, an entire history to be written about the cities where the peace was broken in 1960, and about the countryside where it was once believed that the peace would not in a thousand years be violated, and where it is now being violated by children.

One of the children reported a week ago that the afternoon had been spent in Smithville, in Lee County, and that not many of the people there were prepared to rejoice that they had been deemed worthy to suffer persecution in anyone's name.

"Most of the people were sick," she said. "The majority didn't have names."

The uncertain Pontiac of the student workers broke down not long ago behind enemy lines and the band of two blacks and one white rode to the nearest town on the back of a pick-up truck and knocked on the door of a home, so that they could telephone for assistance. They were received and within a half hour two carloads of white men were passing the house, stopping, then moving on. One of the black boys reported "guns" and there was a scurry in the house for a box of 4-10 shells. Then there was waiting and walking up and down, and a phone call to the central office in Albany. It was growing dark. The 13-year-old daughter was watching television with what appeared to be an air of unconcern. One of the students paused in his pacing to ask whether she particularly minded being shot at.

"No," she said, smiling and never turning away from the screen. "Not if it's for our country."

THE ONLY SUCH PUBLICATION OF ITS KIND

VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT NEWSLETTER

Volume 1 August, 1963 Sift - South Number 1

INTRODUCING OUR NEWSLETTER

This is the first issue of the Voter Education Project's monthly report on voter registration work in eleven southern states, and VEP viewpoints on Negro voting. The purpose of this publication is to gather and disseminate news of the various vote drives under our auspices, for your information, and for practical political education.

We will report methods and styles developed by different local projects in persuading and helping citizens to register. We will present difficulties, successes, and failures of these drives as pioneer experience from which other community projects may learn. The newsletter will attempt also to tabulate results of these voter efforts and pass them on in this report, to be issued the 15th of each month. The newsletter also will offer comment and interpretation on experience of groups in the field over the South.

Wiley Branton

This newsletter, as the official organ of VEP is, of course, non-political and non-partisan. It will, adhering to VEP's purpose, confine its interest to methods and results of voter registration drives, and in no way concerns itself with any political candidates, issues, or legislation. The aims of VEP are voter registration, and acquiring information about how voters are registered, and its program is limited to these aims. So the newsletter will report and occasionally comment on the project's findings, with no political interest or policy whatever, except registering voters.

VEP was begun in the spring of 1962 and is planned to continue at least through 1964. The agency operates on funds granted to the Southern Regional Council by foundations interested in a large, free southern electorate. Project work in the main is done by the five major civil rights organizations, NAACP, CORE, SNCC, SCLC, NUL. Frequently, however, VEP makes special grants to local groups with a record of success in registering voters, where local conditions show the need for voting assistance and promotion. The project also functions to provide advice, materials, information and other experienced help to local groups even when it cannot give funds.

J. Minnis

The Project has assembled a large, and perhaps unique, store of information about ways and means of registering voters, and the obstacles and frustrations to be met. This information is available to any persons or groups who wish to benefit from this past and present experience in registration campaigns in their own communities.

Wiley A. Branton, civil rights lawyer from Pine Bluff, Arkansas, who was chief counsel for the plaintiffs in the school desegregation cases of Little Rock in 1957 and has practiced law for a decade in the South, is VEP director. Randolph Blackwell, law school graduate of Howard University, former political science and business law teacher in North Carolina and Alabama colleges, is director of field activities for VEP, and travels over the region to supervise, report on, and assist the local projects. Jack Minnis, a doctoral candidate in political science at Tulane University and author of magazine articles on civil rights and political topics, is director of research and consultant to workers in the field.

R. Blackwell

Mrs. Jean Levine is office manager and administrative secretary, assisted by Mrs. Janet Shortt.

NEW TECHNIQUES IN VOTER EDUCATION

A survey of voter registration projects scattered across the eleven southern states shows a tendency of successful workers to by-pass or greatly augment the traditional house-to-house canvass means of registration. VEP found after a year's study of local projects, a great variance in results, attributable to many factors. Some success and some failure, or slight and slow progress, can be explained by the political maturity, experience and know-how of the Negro community. Memphis, where colored voters have long wielded political influence, of course is more responsive to registration projects and shows greater increases in registered voters than, say, a registration campaign in Jackson, Mississippi, where registration is attended by intimidations, and where Negroes have had very little political hope or activity in recent years. Similarly, a vote drive in Macon, Georgia, with a free and experienced Negro political organization, brought several thousand new registered voters, while a campaign in Gadsden, Alabama, had what can be considered a notable success in registering a handful of Negroes against great obstacles and threats from the white community.

It also become apparent from VEP information from the field that registration groups which invent new, untried techniques and create appealing, rousing presentation of their programs to the people, come through with excellent results in interest and the number of new registrants. In Huntsville, Alabama, for instance, the registration committee hung two signs on a mule which they paraded through the streets with the message: "This friend is not registered because he is a mule — what is your excuse?" This conspicuous appeal within a few days excited talk, laughter, and interest which started a highly successful drive. New approaches like this appear up and down the line.

Some organizations do well with

(Continued on Page 4)

VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT NEWSLETTER

5 Forsyth St., Rm. 206

Atlanta, Ga.

Ph. 525-0595

Staff

Wiley Branton

R. T. Blackwell J. Minnis

J. Levine J. Shortt

You Should Read

"If We Must Die"

By Junius Edwards

All too frequently, fiction which attempts to serve the purpose of social protest can be comfortably dismissed with the argument that it is, after all, fiction, and does not necessarily conform to the situation which actually exists. I think the American people need to know that such an argument is wholly invalid with respect to Mr. Edwards' work. Those who read it — and I think it extremely important that it receives the widest public attention — will doubtless be uncomfortable at the conflict between the conditions which the book presents on one hand, and the kind of society which we should all like to think America is on the other. If such discomfort cannot be alleviated by rationalizing that the book is merely fiction, then perhaps the American people will be more inclined to take the action which is necessary to remedy the conditions.

For more than a year, the Voter Education Project has been granting funds for the support of registration drives among Negroes in the South. Since our primary purpose is that of research, we have taken the trouble to assemble a large body of data concerning the conditions with respect to Negro registration throughout the South. The story which Mr. Edwards presents in "If We Must Die" could have been taken, almost in its entirety, from any one of dozens of files in our office. I say this to point out that while technically Mr. Edwards' book is a work of fiction, as a matter of fact, it is an accurate description of conditions which exist with respect to registration and voting for Negroes in many parts of the southern United States as of today.

Wiley A. Branton, Director
Voter Education Project

Blowin' In The Wind . . . .

Selma, Alabama

Bernard Lafayette, Bossie Reese, and their fellow workers continue to instruct and encourage Selma Negroes to register and vote in Dallas and Wilcox counties. In spite of the arrests, intimidations and beatings of their leaders, Dallas and Wilcox county Negroes courageously demand their rights as U. S. citizens at their county courthouses daily. Twenty or more appear at each courthouse on registration days, the first and third Mondays of each month.

Birmingham, Alabama

The young people of Birmingham and Jefferson County are conducting a registration drive that grew out of the demonstrations which terminated on May 12. It was organized by Andy Young, James Bevel, and Dorothy Cotton, of SCLC. The Negro community has supported the students fully. More than 1,800 now have been registered. The cooperation of Orzell Billingsley, Jr., and Mrs. Bernice Johnson made possible the filing of the Justice Department suit in Birmingham, asking that more than 2,000 named Negroes be ordered registered because of discrimination at the registrar's office.

Mobile, Alabama

C. M. Montgomery and Atty. Vernon Crawford, assisted by the strategy planning of Freeman Pollard, have begun a registration program in Mobile, called the Mobile County Voter Education Project. Enough enthusiasm was generated at a March meeting between Mobile leaders and VEP staff that 400 persons were registered even before the details of the VEP sponsorship had been worked out. A Mr. Bishop, who is blind, registered 28 persons, we are informed.

Montgomery, Alabama

Sim E. Williams, project coordinator for the Montgomery County Voter Education Project, is completing an up-to-date list of the registered voters of the county. The registration drive will start shortly after August 15. The Barristers Club of Montgomery (all the Negro lawyers in town) initiated the project and helped form an executive committee of leadership from all the clubs in the county. The executive committee sets policy and makes available the resources of all the organizations. The project enjoys the support of Rufus Lewis of long registration distinction in the community.

Atlanta, Georgia

Jesse Hill, director of the Atlanta All Citizens Registration Committee reports more than 3,700 new registered voters in Fulton County since April. The Atlanta effort will continue for several months.

Negro citizens of Leflore County, Mississippi, registering at the county courthouse in Greenwood.

Mississippi

Bob Moses, Council of Federated Organizations director, reports that between 500 and 700 persons voted by affidavit in the state-wide primary on August 7 in Greenwood. In Holmes, Sunflower, and Hinds counties, more than 600 persons tried to vote under the Mississippi affidavit law, but were turned away from the polls.

SNCC men Charles McLaurin, Charles Cobb, and Curtis Hayes were arrested by Ruleville city police when they led a group of 40 citizens to the Ruleville Community Center to vote (some by affidavit and others by registration). The three were taken to the Sunflower County jail and tried that same evening in Mayor's Court in Indianola. According to Sunflower SNCC registration workers in Leflore County Mississippi jail.

County Chief Deputy Sheriff Bradley, the three were convicted of "tryin' to commit a crime".

U. S. Senator James O. Eastland lives in Sunflower County when he is not in Washington trying to prevent the passage of legislation guaranteeing the right to vote. Senator Eastland insists there is no need for such legislation, particularly in his native Sunflower County.

Several hundred new registered voters voted for the first time in the Democratic primary. Those voting by affidavit had attempted to register, but had been turned down by the county registrars. They were convinced, despite the registrar's refusal to enter their names in the books, that they were as qualified as any person under the Mississippi "laws". Local policemen guarding the polls disagreed with them. "The answer is blowin' in the wind".

John O'Neal and Carl Johnson, SNCC field men, have reactivated the Council of Federated Organizations Hattiesburg project. The Fifth Circuit Court ordered registrar Theron Lynd to purge himself of contempt by registering 43 named Negroes and by applying the Mississippi literacy test without discrimination. John and Carl will keep an eye on Theron, lest he slip back into his old bad habits. Meanwhile, they'll organize a concentrated registration drive in the Hattiesburg community. Mississippi is on the move.

Greensboro, N. Carolina

American Friends Service Committee began a registration drive early in August. Mr. Carlton Mabee is directing the project with workers recruited from the ranks of Guilford College students. The emphasis of the program will be voter education, with registration a secondary benefit. The experience of this project should be of immense benefit to future registration efforts in Guilford County.

Kingstree, S. Carolina

Williamsburg County leaders, Jonnie Dimery and Rev. S. A. Gadston, with the help of Congress of Racial Equality men Frank Robinson and E. Brown, seem to have moved the county registrars into a more reasonable posture. Registration is confined to one day a month, the first Monday. Last March, more than one hundred persons lined up at the registrar's office; only eleven were admitted and only nine accepted. In April, more than 200 persons lined up; again, only eleven were admitted, and again only nine were accepted. In May, more than 100 again lined up, and again only nine were registered. But in June, 96 were admitted, and, of these, 65 were accepted. It's difficult to say exactly what produced the change, but reports are that U. S. Justice Department representatives and the Attorney General of South Carolina found it advisable to consult with Williamsburg county officials.

Plaquemine, Louisiana

Congress of Racial Equality man Ronnie Moore reports that the CORE task force summer project is conducting registration programs in Tangipahoa, St. Helena, East Baton Rouge, West Feliciana, East Feliciana and Pointe Coupe parishes. Though numerical results are expected to be small at first, the important fact is that Negroes are beginning to register in these hard-core segregation areas. This in itself is a radical departure from the past.

Mr. Moore and his co-workers were able to save more than 500 Negroes from a purge of the registration rolls in Iberville parish by informing the voters of what they must do to remain on the rolls.

Charleston, S. Carolina

Esau Jenkins, President of the Citizens Committee of Charleston County, announced the beginning of a registration drive July 15 which will run through November 15. It was reported by Mrs. Jean C. Townsend, Chairman of the Charleston County Registration board that 501 Negroes registered during the three registration days of August. She said, "I haven't seen anything like this". Mr. Jenkins and his co-workers have the kind of reputation in voter registration which inspires confidence that the program in Charleston will produce a decided change for the better in the registration picture there.

Macon, Georgia

The Bibb County Coordinating Committee, under the leadership of William Randall, recently completed a registration drive during which more than 3,000 new voters were added to the registrar's books. Mr. Randall's organization plans another drive early in the fall.

Alabama

Mrs. Bernice Johnson, of the Alabama State Coordinating Association for Registration and Voting, reports that 675 new voters were registered in nine Alabama counties during the registration days, July 1-5, 1963. This is only a partial total of the drive in more than twenty counties. Future issues will report the total results of this drive.

The NAACP reports the following increases in registration since April of this year: Tampa, Fla., 331; Jackson, Miss., 488; Memphis, Tenn., 4,226; Gainesville, Fla., 308; St. Petersburg, Fla., 902; Augusta, Ga., 195; Polk County, Fla., 626.

Students of Ballard-Hudson and Appling High Schools registering at City Hall, Macon, Georgia.

PLEASE CLIP AND MAIL TO:
THE VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT
5 Forsyth St., N. W., Room 206
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

☐ I would like to be on your mailing list to receive future copies of the VEP newsletter.

☐ I would like to talk with a VEP representative about registration work in my community.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

Poll Tax Amendment Nears Ratification

The proposed amendment below was approved by the 87th Congress of the United States August 27, 1962. It was submitted to the fifty states, and will become a part of the Constitution when it is ratified by the legislators of three-fourths of the states, if these ratifications take place within seven years.

Already thirty-six states have ratified this amendment. The two additional states needed for adoption of the amendment will probably ratify it in the near future.

Proposed Amendment

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Milestone In Georgia

Less than a year has passed since Leroy Johnson, Atlanta lawyer, was elected to the Senate of the Georgia General Assembly, the first Negro to serve in the Legislature since 1907.

Mr. Johnson's election and quiet service to his constituency is more than a Georgia political milestone. It is proof to Negro voters all over the South of the power of their vote in free elections.

Last November, free from county unit shackles and the racist opinion of rural communities, urban Georgians, including influential numbers of Negro voters, went to the polls, and — each voter's ballot being equal — elected a moderate governor and the state's first Negro in the Legislature.

Senator Johnson's performance has been quiet, able, and effective. One of the bills he introduced has already been signed into law.

An interesting aspect of Negro exercise of the ballot last year in Georgia is the elevation of statesmanship not only in the Legislature, but political circles over the state. It is well known that one of Georgia's most extreme segregationists, a young politician, not only received Senator Johnson with unprecedented civility, but invited him to his home for dinner. The senator also has visited U. S. Senator Talmadge, long-time political and segregationist "king" of the Georgia political machine, at his home in Lovejoy, suggesting that the Negro politicians advent to the capitol has vastly improved the manners of white leadership.

Voter Education

(Continued from Page 1)

competition, with registration encouraged by contests. Sometimes its a race between clubs and churches competing for a prize for the registration of the most voters. Sometimes its a contest to get each Negro organization in a community to register their members 100%, with prizes for the 100 per centers. One registration group listed all its community church and club names — more than 100 — on a large scoreboard on a downtown street, and periodically listed the percentages of memberships registering to vote, which excited great interest from the organizations and others in the town.

Several communities have increased voter registration by talking to prospective voters when they come to the courthouse on other business. Another city plans to begin its registration drive with a big parade of bands, floats, and marching citizens. Another group plans to promote registration with a radio marathon. A large, deep South community is considering a series of beer parties to interest citizens in voting, and still another town is looking around for a celebrated entertainer to give a benefit performance for new registrants.

A surprise night life gimmick gets good results in Mobile, Alabama, where night club owners poll their customers to find who is registered and who is not. And, voter registration activity frequently displaces more frivolous and less civil backroom activity on many evenings of the Mobile week.

Voter registration workers are often asked, "Are you doing anything for the people politically other than just getting their names on the books?" And they reply, "Well, we're persuading the people to take the first step.

Voter Education Project
5 Forsyth Street, Room 206
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

have been the breath of Korean political life, and it has long been the curse preventing the growth of a healthy parliamentary democracy. One reason the military coup of 1961 succeeded was that Yun Po-sun, then President, was a bitter political foe of Premier John M. Chang (though both belonged to the same political party). Yun did nothing to rally the country against what was actually a threat to the principle of civilian rule. Mr. Yun, a nobleman, was again the leading civilian candidate for the presidency, but the memory of his past behavior, as well as of more recent factional divisions, tarnished his image.

The military junta itself, however, has a record little better than that of the civilian politicians. Even today army ranks are split between the majority favoring General Park (a "Democratic-Republican") and a minority supporting the Liberal-Democratic Party, which was also founded under army auspices but which chose as its candidate one of Park's most outspoken opponents, former Lieutenant General Song Yo-chan.

General Song, who once served as Premier under General Park, was clapped into jail soon after he had issued a public statement telling Park not to think of himself as the "indispensable man." Freed once following American intercession, he was arrested again last month on charges dating back to the Korean War. His brief campaign and subsequent withdrawal were conducted from Seoul's Mapo prison.

General Park has maneuvered adroitly between the factions within the military establishment. He has exiled both Brigadier Kim Chong-pil, founder of the Democratic Republicans, and Major-General Kim Jae-choon, who established the Liberal-Democrats.

He and his military cohorts have consciously fanned factionalism within civilian ranks. Among the civilians, many who originally supported former Premier Huh Chung were reportedly bought up by adherents of the Democratic-Republican Party. The same goes for supporters of former President Yun.

So, the Korean voter was presented with a choice between two kinds of failure: General Park had promised but had not brought stability and a better life to the people. The civilian politicians, of whom former President Yun was the strongest contender, were unable until the last minute to sacrifice personal and factional rivalries and unite on a single candidate even to safeguard the principle of civilian supremacy and parliamentary government.

Takashi Oka

The New Republic 10/26/63

NEGROES ARE DRAGGED OFF FEDERAL PROPERTY AS THE FBI LOOKS ON

The New Republic 10/26/63

Suff. · Southern

Registration in Alabama

Selma

There are 30,000 Negroes and less than 25,000 whites in Dallas County, Alabama. On the voting rolls, however, there are about 130 Negroes and 7,000 whites. On the first and third Mondays of every month, the Board of Registrars of Dallas County takes additional applications from would-be voters. The form, however, is a long one, and the applicant is also questioned orally. As a result, the Board has never been able to enroll more than 30 new voters in a day.

At this rate even making the incredible assumption that the Board accepted every Negro applicant, it would take the Board 10 years to enroll as many Negroes as whites. Nevertheless, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) began a voter-registration campaign in Dallas County last summer. It proclaimed October 7 as "Freedom Day." At 9:30 a.m. on Freedom Day there were 50 Negroes in line before the county courthouse, in the cotton town of Selma.

By 11:00 a.m. there were 250 Negroes in the line, which extended the full length of the block, around the corner, and halfway down the street. Two hundred of them would never get inside the courthouse door.

Standing over these men and women, were helmeted men with clubs and guns, members of Sheriff Clark's posse. By noon, the line of Negroes reached 300. The sun was hot, and the line did not seem to be moving.

Directly across the street from the county courthouse in Selma is the Federal Building. Here are the federal court, the draft board, the social security office – all the visible manifestations that the Civil War was won by the Union and that the national government is supreme all over the United States. In this building, on the first floor, its windows looking directly at the county courthouse, is the office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the police force of the national government, created to enforce the laws of the United States.

Four FBI agents and two Justice Department lawyers spent Freedom Day in this building. The FBI agents were taking pictures, and watching. The Justice Department men were just watching.

Through all that happened on that Monday, while federal law was broken again and again, these law enforcement officials of the federal government stood by and watched. By the time Freedom Day was over in Selma, the Constitution had been violated in a number of its provisions, several statutes of the US Congress had been ignored, the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 had been turned face down on the sidewalk. For all the good the federal officials did, George Wallace might have been President of the United States.

What happened in Selma on Freedom Day?

A Negro registrant, before he got to the door of the county courthouse, had to run a gauntlet of armed troopers and a local cameraman whose pictures could cost the Negro his or her job.

The registrants waited from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., standing in the sun without food or water, without being able to go to the toilet. State troopers told them they could not leave the line and return. (When I asked a Justice Department lawyer standing by if he would go over to the state troopers and say that these Negroes had a right to get a drink of water, he said: "I think they do have that right. But I won't do it.")

There were two "incidents."

1. At 11:55 a.m. I looked away from the line of registrants, across the street to the Federal Building. On the steps of the building – so still that for a weird second I thought they were statues – stood two young members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, facing the county courthouse across the street and holding signs. One, in overalls and a fedora, carried a sign saying "Register Now for Freedom Now." The other, in a polo shirt and slacks, carried a sign which read, "Register to Vote."

I crossed the street to get a better look. At that moment – it was a few moments before noon – Sheriff Jim Clark and two members of his posse also crossed the street, walked up the steps of the Federal Building, snatched the signs, and pulled the two young fellows down the stairs and into a police car. I have seen a number of examples of the invisibility of federal power in the South, but I didn't quite believe this. I turned to the Justice Department man and asked, "Is that a federal building?" "Yes," he replied.

2. Lunchtime passed, but no lunch for the more than 300 Negroes on the registration line. The sun was hotter now. Jim Forman, in charge of the day's operations, sent some people for sandwiches and water. By now, Al Lingo's blue-helmeted state police – commanded by Major Joe Smelley – had taken over from the posse, but Sheriff Clark and his men were still around. Jim Forman and Mrs. Boynton (a local Negro leader) walked over to talk to Sheriff Clark (it was 1:55 p.m.). Forman said: "Sheriff, we'd like to give these people some food." Clark replied: "They will not be molested in any way." Forman said: "We don't want to molest them. We want to give them food and to talk to them about registration." Clark shouted: "If you do, you'll be arrested. They will not be molested in any way and that includes talking to them."

Forman and Mrs. Boynton went back across the street to the alley alongside the Federal Building, where a shopping cart with a keg of water and sandwiches were set up. Newsmen were called over. Mrs. Boynton said: "We want to see if to Mr. Clark 'molesting' means giving people food." Forman told the newsmen: "We wired the Justice Department last night for marshals; we figured Clark might be violating federal law today. But we've had no reply."

Two SNCC members, Chico Neblett, a tall, good-looking former student at Southern Illinois University, and Avery Williams, dark, quiet, stepped forward and filled their arms with sandwiches and registration material. It was an unreal scene: food was going to be delivered to people standing in line in front of a public building, and it was as if paratroopers were preparing to drop into enemy country in wartime.

"Let's go, man," Neblett said. He and Williams crossed the street. We – newsmen, photographers, a few others – followed. The state troopers converged on the two young men as they approached the line. Major Smelley yelled: "Get 'em!" Suddenly the two were on the ground. I saw Chico Neblett stretched out, troopers over him. I saw them jab at him with their clubs and saw him writhe under what looked like shock induced by the electric cattle prods the troopers carried. Four of them picked him up and dragged him away, and then I saw them throw him and young Williams into the green arrest truck at the corner. In the meantime state troopers and posse men were pushing and shoving all of us standing nearby, cursing, threatening, ripping one photographer's clothes. We retreated across the street. The Justice Department men hurried in and out of the Federal Building. The FBI watched.

I walked down to the corner a few minutes later, to see if the line that had extended all the way around it and halfway down the block was diminished by the tension. Some 30 more Negroes had joined the line. I went back to the steps of the Federal Building and waited for Freedom Day to be over. At 4:30 p.m. it was, and the several hundred men and women in line drifted away. A young Negro lawyer, visiting from Detroit, who had observed the day's events, said with emotion in his voice, pointing to the people walking quietly from the line: "Those people are heroes. They should be given medals."

Then what should be given the President and the Attorney General of the US? HOWARD ZINN

Enforcing Civil Rights

This week The New Republic publishes on page 11 a report by Howard Zinn on the effort of Negroes to register to vote in Selma, Alabama. Theoretically, this effort is protected by the 1957 Civil Rights Act. Yet the Act was repeatedly violated while Justice Department lawyers and FBI agents looked on, impotent. These men did, of course, take notes and pictures, and perhaps at some distant date, if their reports look persuasive to the Justice Department in Washington, the Attorney General will bring a case against one or more of the officials who violated the law. But the chances of such a prosecution are not very great. The Justice Department knows from sad experience that only an outrageous case has even an outside chance of eliciting a conviction from the Southern jury, and Southern whites are not easily outraged by the conduct of other whites towards Negroes.

What then is to be done to protect the rights, guaranteed by both the Constitution and the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which were violated on October 7 in Selma – and on many other days all over the South. In a letter accompanying his report, Mr. Zinn suggests that "a permanent federal presence is needed in the Deep South, armed with the power of on-the-spot arrest. What I am suggesting is the creation, by Presidential order, of a special force of at least a thousand federal agents to stand guard throughout the Deep South in protection of the constitutional rights of the people of that region. The force could be recruited to a great extent from young college graduates, Negro and white, who would come to the job with a special commitment to its goals, and would be trained to deal with the problem. It would have the appeal and enthusiasm of the Peace Corps, and the full backing of the national government. And, as the years went on, it would have less and less to do."

"It may be objected," he concludes, "that this envisions a radical new departure in state-federal relations. That is probably just what is needed."

Zinn's proposal has obvious drawbacks. The mere existence of such a force might make many local communities more rebellious, and might make many local police officers even more reluctant than they now are to uphold law and order. In the long run such a force might mean shifting responsibility for law enforcement from the local to the federal level. This would require the creation of a full-fledged national police force. Nevertheless, it may well be that nothing short of this will secure the Negro his full rights as a citizen of the United States.

Opinion by the New Republic of Zinn article.

Current Suff. Ala
December, 1963

RACISM IN THE U.S.

IS THE LAW ENFORCEABLE IN THE SOUTH?

Dr. Zinn is chairman of the Department of History and Social Science at Spelman College in Atlanta, Georgia. The following is his report on events in Selma, Alabama, on Oct. 7, 1963.

Howard Zinn

"There are 30,000 Negroes and less than 25,000 whites in Dallas County, Alabama. On the voting rolls, however, there are about 130 Negroes and 7,000 whites. On the first and third Mondays of every month, the Board of Registrars of Dallas County takes additional applications from would-be voters. The form, however, is a long one, and the applicant is also questioned orally. As a result, the Board has never been able to enroll more than thirty new voters in a day.

"At this rate, even making the incredible assumption that the Board accepted every Negro applicant, it would take the Board ten years to enroll as many Negroes as whites. Nevertheless, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (S.N.C.C.) began a voter-registration campaign in Dallas County last summer. It proclaimed October 7 as 'Freedom Day.' At 9:30 a.m. on Freedom Day there were fifty Negroes in line before the county courthouse, in the cotton town of Selma. By 11 a.m. there were 250 Negroes in the line. . . .

"Standing over these men and women were helmeted men with clubs and guns, members of Sheriff Clark's posse. By noon, the line of Negroes reached 300. The sun was hot, and the line did not seem to be moving.

"Directly across the street from the county courthouse in Selma is the federal building. Here are the federal court, the draft board, the social security office—all the visible manifestations that the Civil War was won by the Union and that the national government is supreme all over the United States. In this building, on the first floor, its windows looking directly at the county courthouse, is the office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the police force of the national government, created to enforce the laws of the United States. Four F.B.I. agents and two Justice Department lawyers spent Freedom Day in this building. . . .

"Through all that happened on that Monday, while federal law was broken again and again, these law enforcement officials of the federal government stood by and watched. By the time Freedom Day was over in Selma, the Constitution had been violated in a number of its provisions, several statutes of the U.S. Congress had been ignored, the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 had been turned face down. . . .

"What happened in Selma on Freedom Day?

"A Negro registrant, before he got to the door of the county courthouse, had to run a gauntlet of armed troopers and a local cameraman whose pictures could cost the Negro his or her job.

"The registrants waited from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., standing in the sun without food or water, without being able to go to the toilet. State troopers told them they could not leave the line and return. . . .

"There were two 'incidents.'

"1) At 11.55 I looked away from the line of registrants, across the street to the federal building. On the steps of the building—so still that for a weird second I thought they were statues—stood two young members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, facing the county courthouse across the street and holding signs. One, in overalls and a fedora, carried a sign saying 'Register Now for Freedom Now.' The other, in a polo shirt and slacks, carried a sign which read, 'Register to Vote.'

"I crossed the street to get a better look. At that moment—it was a few moments before noon—Sheriff Jim Clark and two members of his posse also crossed the street, walked up the steps of the federal building, snatched the signs, and pulled the two young fellows down the stairs and into a police car. I have seen a number of examples of the invisibility of federal power in the South, but I didn't quite believe this. I turned to the Justice Department man and asked, 'Is that a federal building?' 'Yes,' he replied.

"2) Lunchtime passed, but no lunch for the more than 300 Negroes on the registration line. The sun was hotter now. Jim Forman, in charge of the day's operations, sent some people for sandwiches and water. By now, Al Lingo's blue-helmeted state police—commanded by Major Joe Smelley—had taken over from the posse, but Sheriff Clark and his men were still around. Jim Forman and Mrs. Boynton (a local Negro leader) walked over to talk to Sheriff Clark (it was 1:55). Forman said: 'Sheriff, we'd like to give these people some food.' Clark replied: 'They will not be molested in any way.' Forman said: 'We don't want to molest them. We want to give them food and to talk to them about registration.' Clark shouted: 'If you do, you'll be arrested. They will not be molested in any way and that includes talking to them.'

"Forman and Mrs. Boynton went back across the street to the alley alongside the federal building, where a shopping cart with a keg of water and sandwiches was set up. Newsmen were called over. Mrs. Boynton said: 'We want to see if to Mr. Clark "molesting" means giving people food.' Forman told the newsmen. 'We wired the Justice Department last night for marshals; we figured Clark might be violating federal law today. But we've had no reply.'

"Two S.N.C.C. members, Chico Neblett, a tall, good-looking former student at Southern Illinois University, and Avery Williams, dark and quiet, stepped forward and filled their arms with sandwiches and registration material. It was an unreal scene: food was going to be delivered to people standing in line in front of a public building, and it was as if paratroopers were preparing to drop into enemy country in wartime.

" 'Let's go, man,' Neblett said. He and Williams crossed the street. We—newsmen, photographers, a few others—followed. The state troopers converged on the two young men as they approached the line. Major Smelley yelled: 'Get 'em!' Suddenly the two were on the ground. I saw Chico Neblett stretched out, troopers over him. I saw them jab at him with their clubs and saw him writhe under what looked like shock induced by the electric cattle prods the troopers carried. Four of them picked him up and dragged him away, and then I saw them throw him and young Williams into the green arrest truck at the corner. In the meantime state troopers and posse men were pushing and shoving all of us standing nearby, cursing, threatening, ripping one photographer's clothes.

"We retreated across the street. The Justice Department men hurried in and out of the federal building. The F.B.I. watched." ("Registration in Alabama," The New Republic, Oct. 26, 1963)

WOULD A FEDERAL POLICE FORCE HELP?

In an editorial dealing with the report by Howard Zinn (above), The New Republic assesses the wisdom of creating a special police force to deal with the crisis of law in the South.

The New Republic

"What then is to be done to protect the rights, guaranteed by both the Constitution and the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which were violated on October 7 in Selma—and on many other days all over the South. In a letter accompanying his report, Mr. Zinn suggests that 'a permanent federal presence is needed in the Deep South, armed with the power of on-the-spot arrest. What I am suggesting is the creation, by Presidential order, of a special force of at least a thousand federal agents to stand guard throughout the Deep South in protection of the constitutional rights of the people of that region. The force could be recruited to a great extent from young college graduates, Negro and white. . . .

" 'It may be objected,' he concludes, 'that this envisions a radical new departure in state-federal relations. That is probably just what is needed.'

"Zinn's proposal has obvious drawbacks. The mere existence of such a force might make many local communities more rebellious, and might make many local police officers even more reluctant than they now are to uphold law and order. In the long run such a force might mean shifting responsibility for law enforcement from the local to the federal level. This would require the creation of a full-fledged national police force. Nevertheless, it may well be that nothing short of this will secure the Negro his full rights as a citizen of the United States.

"Certainly none of the legislative proposals recently made by liberal Congressmen would have helped in Selma. . . . At present, everyone wants to help the Negro by making more and more forms of appalling behavior by whites illegal. This is all very well in moderate communities where the mere fact of a deed's being illegal makes it less likely. But it does not take us very far in Selma. There, the problem is how to enforce laws and implement powers already on the books. . . .

"The Constitution requires that alleged violators of the law be given trial by jury, in the community where the crime is alleged to have been committed. Juries being human, this means that no law, whether on civil rights or any other subject, can be effectively enforced in the courts when it is violently opposed by a large proportion of the local community. . . .

"We have said before, and we must say again, that the long-term objective of the civil rights movement should not be to subdue the white supremacist in the South but to change him. For no minority so large and so determined as the white supremacists can be permanently subdued without radical (and lamentable) changes in American life. . . .

"Mr. Zinn argues that once the rights of the Negro are asserted, the need for federal intervention will diminish. This may be true. If we were convinced that it were true, we would support such intervention. But we are not entirely convinced. And while permanent federal intervention may ultimately be necessary simply to prevent anarchy, we do not think the situation in the South is quite that bad—yet. Still, unless the white Southerners show a little more flexibility, Mr. Zinn's approach may be the only alternative to anarchy. That this would be a catastrophe for the nation, and would probably eliminate hope for civilizing the South in the forseeable future, does not make it impossible." ("Enforcing Civil Rights," The New Republic, Oct. 26, 1963)

Suff. La.

PAR ANALYSIS

No. 115 Public Affairs Research Council of Louisiana, Inc. December, 1963

WB - file
JT - file Suffrage La.

TOPIC of the MONTH

CHOOSING A PRESIDENT

HIGHLIGHTS

- There are six and sometimes seven steps in selecting a President: (1) choosing delegates to national party conventions; (2) nomination of presidential and vice presidential candidates at the convention; (3) selection of party presidential electors to be voted on at the November general election; (4) the November election in which electors receiving the most votes in a state are elected; (5) casting of electoral votes at state capitols; (6) counting of electoral votes by Congress; and (7) possible election by Congress should no presidential or vice presidential candidate gain a majority of electoral votes.

- Louisiana voters have been directly involved in selecting a President only in the November election. Voters in some other states participate at other stages.

- Louisiana law allows party state central committees to decide the method for nominating presidential electors. In the past, the committees picked the electors. However, the Louisiana Democratic State Central Committee departed from this procedure and adopted a resolution authorizing a primary election to nominate Democratic electors.

- The primary is to be held in conjunction with the congressional primary on July 25, 1964, a month ahead of the Democratic National Convention, when the presidential and vice presidential candidates are to be nominated.

- The resolution provides for only two slates of electors on the July ballot. One would be pledged to the national Democratic nominees; it is not certain if the other slate would be pledged to another candidate or would be uppledged.

- It is recommended that the legislature designate a specific method for nominating presidential electors to avoid sudden changes by any party state central committee. The method prescribed by law should be that party state central committees pick party nominees for presidential elector.

- Louisiana voters should be assured the opportunity to vote on presidential candidates nominated by national conventions, whether or not the state committees endorse them.

CHOOSING A PRESIDENT

The extent to which voters can and should participate in the selection of the President of the United States has been discussed considerably in Louisiana. Several questions are involved.

- Should voters help decide the national party candidates for President through a "preferential presidential primary" in which delegates to the national party conventions would be selected or instructed by popular vote?
- Should presidential electors representing a political party be selected through a primary election rather than by appointment of the state central committee?
- Should presidential electors be "unpledged" and therefore free to vote as they wish for a President?
- Should the electoral college system be changed to provide the people a more direct voice in the election of a President?

The selection of a President is a lengthy and complicated procedure. The manner of selecting delegates to national conventions and choosing presidential electors is left to the individual states. States differ considerably in their provisions, adding further to the complexity of selecting a President.

Louisiana voters have been directly involved in selecting a President only in the November presidential election; whereas in some states voters participate in other stages. The Louisiana Democratic State Central Committee, at its meeting on September 7, 1963, adopted a resolution to provide that Democratic presidential electors be chosen through a primary election. The provisions and effects of this resolution are discussed later in this report.

BACKGROUND AND COMMENT

Much of the discussion involving the selection of a President of the United States centers around the question of whether or not the people should participate more directly in determining who is President. Louisiana voters could play a more direct role than they now do at several stages in the procedures for selecting a President.

Preferential Presidential Primaries

In 1960, 15 states and the District of Columbia held primaries in which voters could express a choice for President before the parties nominated their candidates at their national conventions. There is no doubt that the 1960 primaries played a major role in pre-convention maneuvering and in determining the candidates who were nominated, particularly the Democratic nominees. The hopes of Hubert Humphrey were destroyed when he failed to win the West Virginia primary. On the other hand, primaries greatly enhanced the strength of John F. Kennedy.

The degree to which primaries actually allow voters to express a choice for President and measure a candidate's strength has been debated for a long time.

Those favoring primaries feel that they are the only means by which the voter can express his choice for President before the field is narrowed to two major presidential candidates. If convention delegates are bound by results of a primary, then the voter can have a direct influence on the selection of a presidential candidate, particularly in early balloting at the convention. Primaries are a way for some potential presidential candidates to prove their voter appeal to their party and thus become serious contenders at the convention. It is further maintained that primaries offer the voter an opportunity to reduce the influence of party bosses who may otherwise control the convention.

Primaries are discounted by others who feel that they are mere exercises in public opinion but not true tests of the voters' choice. They are held in less than a third of the states. Since they are held at different times, campaign issues may be discussed differently; they may be held too early for the real issues to become evident. The primary ballot usually lists a small number of candidates and may not include the major contenders. A voter thus may not have an opportunity to vote for a candidate, but only against one. The voters' influence may amount to little if convention delegates are not bound by results of the primary. The first presidential primary is held in March in New Hampshire. Some maintain this makes the campaign for President too long, and gives an undue influence to voters in New Hampshire who may set the trend.

There have been many attempts to encourage the growth of preferential presidential primaries. It has even been suggested that primaries be held in all states on the same day. Should this happen, it is possible that the role of national conventions would be weakened.

Critics of conventions argue that they are undemocratic; advocates maintain they are no more so than Congress or other assemblies which act on behalf of the people. National conventions have been criticized because of their noise, seeming confusion, and lack of dignity. The chief comment of supporters is simply: "They work."

Primaries to Nominate Electors

Some persons who have stated that they favor presidential primaries are actually talking about primaries to nominate party presidential electors.

If a presidential elector is regarded as a "messenger boy" or "rubber stamp," then the method of selecting electors is not too important so long as the electors can be counted upon to carry out the wishes expressed by the voters.

However, if a presidential elector is regarded as a "free agent," that is, he casts his electoral vote according to his own judgment, then the manner of selecting electors becomes extremely important. Voters will want to be sure that electors are persons whose judgment they trust, since it will be the electors and not the voters who will decide on the presidency.

Free or Unpledged Electors

The merits of "free" or "unpledged" electors have been discussed in Louisiana and other states, particularly in the South. Under the United States Constitution, so long as a person is a duly elected elector, he is free to vote for whom he pleases for President and Vice President. In practice, however, electors do not act as free agents; rather, they act according to the wishes of the voters who elected them. There have been a few instances when an elector did not vote for the presidential candidate of his party, but there have been no decisions denying the right of an elector to do this.

Those favoring unpledged electors argue that the South's role in national affairs would be strengthened. If enough electors were unpledged, they could prevent presidential candidates of the two major parties from gaining a majority of electoral votes. Unpledged electors could either bargain with the two major presidential candidates for concessions between the November election and the time they cast their electoral vote in December, or they could vote for a third candidate and thus possibly throw the election of a President into the U. S. House of Representatives. If the latter possibility materialized, each state would have one vote in the House on the choice of a President. Thus, Louisiana and other southern states would have as much voting strength as the more populous states, such as California and New York.

It is also argued that selection of electors at the same time Louisiana Congressmen are seeking their parties' nominations for office would focus attention on national issues. Candidates for Congress would have to take a more definite position on presidential candidates and national policies.

Opponents of the free-elector movement argue that the people should decide who is to be elected President, and the idea that electors are free agents is over 150 years out of date. It is further argued that persons who cannot accept the candidates nominated by the national conventions of the two major parties should form another party.

Changes in the Electoral College

There is little doubt that the framers of the United States Constitution wished to avoid direct election of the President by the people and, hence, devised the electoral college which was intended to be an independent deliberative body. So long as George Washington was available for the presidency, the original system seemed to justify Alexander Hamilton's comment in The Federalist that "if the manner of it be not perfect, it is at least excellent."

The early rise of political parties and the establishment of extralegal bodies to nominate candidates for the presidency brought the electoral college system, as originally envisioned, to a sudden end. The Constitution originally provided that each elector vote for two candidates for President, and that the candidate receiving the largest number of electoral votes should be President, provided he had a majority. The person receiving the second highest electoral vote should be Vice President. A defect became apparent in the presidential election of 1800 because the electors could not discriminate in their preference for President and Vice President. There was a tie between two persons with the highest electoral vote, and the election was thrown into the House of Representatives. The Twelfth Amendment was ratified in 1804 to require that electors vote separately for President and Vice President.

One political scientist, in commenting on the downfall of the electoral college as originally envisioned, stated:

> "The people had been moving toward the last step to a truly popular system of electing the President--the conversion of the electors into 'mere agents' for registering the wishes of the voters--almost from the beginning, and the abandonment of the double vote in 1804 wiped out any lingering hope (or worry) that the electors would be anything more elevated than 'mere agents' or 'mouthpieces' or 'puppets on a string.' In 1796 an elector in Pennsylvania had ignored a pledge to vote for Adams and had voted instead for Jefferson. The complaint of a Federalist voter still rings through our political consciousness: 'Do I choose Samuel Miles to determine for me whether John Adams or Thomas Jefferson is the fittest man for President of the United States? No, I choose him to act, not to think.'" (Clinton Rossiter, The American Presidency.)

Many proposals have been introduced to change or abolish the electoral college, some dating back to the early 1800s. In 1950 the U. S. Senate approved a proposed constitutional amendment to abolish the electoral college, but the proposal failed to gain House approval. There has been reluctance to change the electoral college, perhaps because of the long experience with the present system and because changes might result in more serious problems than exist under the present system.

All proposals to change the electoral college are aimed at assuring the voters a larger or more direct role in electing a President. A major criticism of the present system is that it puts a premium on accident and enables a minority President to be elected. In fact, 14 presidents received a majority of electoral votes but not a majority of the popular vote; three of these presidents received fewer popular votes than their nearest opponent. The system also favors the large urban states which have many electoral votes and forces candidates to concentrate on them.

An argument in favor of the present electoral college system is that it can translate a narrow popular vote into a sweeping majority of electoral votes; thus, the victory seems more decisive and the country may be more likely to support its new President. The system also gives states a major role, thereby enhancing the status of the federal system. Even though the more urbanized states have an advantage, it is argued that this is counteracted by their underrepresentation in Congress. The electoral college and the unit system of determining a state's electoral vote have helped preserve the two-party system because the party receiving the most votes wins all of a state's electoral votes. The present system makes it difficult for a third party to win electoral votes.

Proposals for changing the electoral college fall into four categories. Bills to effect each of these approaches are now pending in Congress.

1. Abolish Office of Elector. The office of elector would be abolished, but electoral votes and the unit system of deciding a state's electoral vote would be retained. A presidential candidate who received the largest number of popular votes in a state would be assured of receiving the state's electoral votes. There would be no possibility of "unpledged electors," nor of an elector voting for someone other than his party's presidential candidate. This approach would represent the least change in the present system.

2. Proportional Vote. The electoral college and the office of elector would be abolished, but electoral votes would be retained. The unit system of deciding a state's electoral vote would also be abolished. Instead, the electoral vote of a state would be divided among presidential candidates according to their proportion of the popular vote received. Thus, if a presidential candidate received 55 per cent of the popular vote in a state, he would receive 55 per cent of the state's electoral vote instead of all electoral votes as at present. The Lodge-Gossett Amendment, approved by the U. S. Senate in 1950, proposed this method.

3. District System. The electoral college would be retained, but electors would be elected on much the same basis as U. S. Congressmen and Senators. Two electors would be elected state-wide, and the others would be elected from districts similar to or the same as congressional districts. The presidential candidate receiving a plurality vote in a district would receive that electoral vote unless the elector were running in the state at large.

4. Direct Popular Vote. The electoral college system would be abolished, and state boundaries would be disregarded in voting. The presidential candidate receiving the largest popular vote on a nationwide basis would be elected. This approach would probably make the most radical change in the present system of any of the four plans.

PROCEDURES IN ELECTING A PRESIDENT

Present procedures for nominating and electing a man to the presidency have been described as "patched-up machinery." The procedures operate within a context of federal and state law, national custom, and party rules and regulations.

There are six and sometimes seven successive steps in selecting a president. The timetable can stretch from March of one year through the following January or even later.

I. SELECTION OF DELEGATES TO NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

From March to June of a presidential election year, delegates are chosen to the nominating conventions of the two major political parties--the Democrats and the Republicans.

The total number of convention delegates and their apportionment among the states are decided by national committees of the parties, according to party rules. The Democrats and Republicans do not use the same formula to decide on the number of delegates to which each state is entitled, but both use the number of United States Senators and Representatives as a base. In 1960 there were 1,521 delegate votes at the Democratic National Convention of which Louisiana had 26. At the Republican National Convention there were 1,331 delegate votes, and Louisiana had 26 votes also.

Each state decides how delegates to the national conventions are chosen. The procedure is sometimes spelled out in state law or, as in Louisiana, it is left to the parties to decide. There are two types of delegates--district delegates and delegates-at-large. In some states, district delegates are selected by one method and delegates-at-large by another. Each state also sends alternate delegates. The different methods for selecting convention delegates are discussed below and are shown in Table 1.

State Convention or Committee: Most states, including Louisiana, select their delegates to a national convention by state convention or committee, although in some states this method is used only to select delegates-at-large. Delegations selected by convention or committee are usually not committed to a particular presidential candidate. In 1960, 39 states selected all or some of their delegates by state convention or committee.

Convention or Committee Plus Primary: In three states (Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania), the primary is used to select district delegates, while delegates-at-large are selected by state convention or committee. In the New York primary voters do not express a preference for a presidential candidate, while in Illinois and Pennsylvania they do.

Primary Without Presidential Preference: Rhode Island is the only state that provides for election of all delegates by a primary without voters expressing a choice for President. The holding of a primary is optional, however, according to decision of the state central committee.

Preferential Presidential Primary: The preferential presidential primary, unlike the convention or committee method, offers the voter an opportunity to express directly his choice for his party's candidate for President. It originated in the early 1900s in Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin. At one time or another,

Table 2. METHOD OF SELECTING PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS*

| State | Selected by Convention or Committee | Selected by Primary | Primary But No Presidential Candidates Involved | Preferential Presidential Primary: Voters Express Choice for President | Preferential Presidential Primary: Delegates Pledged to Presidential Candidate | Preferential Presidential Primary: Consent of Presidential Candidate Required | Delegates Selected by Convention But Separate Pref. Pres. Primary |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Alabama | Yes[1] | Yes[1] | | | | | |
| Alaska | Yes | [2] | | | | | |
| Arizona | Yes | | | | | | |
| Arkansas | Yes | | | [3] | | | |
| California | | Yes | | Yes | Yes | Yes | |
| Colorado | Yes | | | | | | |
| Connecticut | Yes | | | | | | |
| Delaware | Yes | | | | | | |
| Florida | | Yes | | Yes | No | No | |
| Georgia | Yes | [3] | | | | | |
| Hawaii | Yes | | | | | | |
| Idaho | Yes | | | | | | |
| Illinois | Yes[4] | Yes[4] | | Yes[4] | No | No | |
| Indiana | Yes | | | [5] | | | Yes[5] |
| Iowa | Yes | | | | | | |
| Kansas | Yes | | | | | | |
| Kentucky | Yes | | | | | | |
| LOUISIANA | Yes | | | | | | |
| Maine | Yes | | | | | | |
| Maryland | Yes | | | [5] | | | Yes[5] |
| Massachusetts | | Yes | | Yes | No | No[6] | |
| Michigan | Yes | | | | | | |
| Minnesota | Yes | [2] | | | | | |
| Mississippi | Yes | | | | | | |
| Missouri | Yes | | | | | | |
| Montana | Yes | [2] | | | | | |
| Nebraska | | Yes | | Yes | No | Yes | |
| Nevada | Yes | [7] | | | | | |
| New Hampshire | | Yes | | Yes | Yes[8] | No[9] | |
| New Jersey | | Yes | | Yes | No | No[9] | |
| New Mexico | Yes | | | | | | |
| New York | Yes[4] | Yes[4] | Yes[4] | | | | |
| North Carolina | Yes | | | | | | |
| North Dakota | Yes | | | | | | |
| Ohio | | Yes | | Yes | Yes[8] | Yes | |
| Oklahoma | Yes | | | | | | |
| Oregon | | Yes | | Yes | Yes | No[10] | |
| Pennsylvania | Yes[4] | Yes[4] | | Yes | Yes[8] | No | |
| Rhode Island | Yes | Yes[11] | Yes | | | | |
| South Carolina | Yes | | | | | | |
| South Dakota | | Yes | | Yes | Yes[12] | No | |
| Tennessee | Yes | | | | | | |
| Texas | Yes | | | | | | |
| Utah | Yes | | | | | | |
| Vermont | Yes | | | | | | |
| Virginia | Yes | | | | | | |
| Washington | Yes | | | | | | |
| West Virginia | | Yes | | Yes | No | Yes | |
| Wisconsin | | Yes | | Yes | Yes[13] | Yes | |
| Wyoming | Yes | | | | | | |

*Provisions are applicable to 1960 conventions.

[1] Use of the primary is optional if a party had more than 20 per cent of the vote at the general election for state officers; otherwise, delegates are selected by convention.

[2] Provisions for a preferential presidential primary repealed in 1959.

[3] Authorized but not customarily held.

[4] Delegates-at-large selected by state convention; district delegates elected at a primary.

[5] Delegates selected by convention but results of primary binding on delegates.

[6] Consent not required but must be filed if a delegate's statement of preference for the candidate is to appear on the ballot.

[7] Provisions for a preferential presidential primary repealed in 1955.

[8] Only if delegate signs pledge.

[9] A candidate's name is placed on the ballot by petition but can be withdrawn by the candidate.

[10] A candidate's name is printed on the ballot at the discretion of the secretary of state. A person can have his name removed if he states he is not and does not intend to be a candidate.

[11] Primary optional.

[12] Delegates are bound if the nominating petition states a preference for President.

[13] Delegates are bound unless they run as uninstructed.

26 states and the District of Columbia have provided for presidential primaries. Some state laws have been repealed or declared unconstitutional, and some other states have simply abandoned the primaries. Some of the latest states to repeal their provisions are Nevada (1955) and Alaska, Minnesota and Montana (1959).

Several variations of the presidential primary are used. In some states the voter may vote for delegates who are pledged to a candidate; in other states the voter may vote separately for delegates who may or may not be pledged to a candidate, and on another part of the ballot express his preference for a candidate for President. Whether or not the results of the primary are binding on delegates and the extent to which delegates are bound depend on the provisions of the individual states.

When delegates are bound, provision is usually made for release at some stage of the balloting. Some states require the consent of a presidential candidate before his name can be entered in the primary, while others do not. Write-in votes are allowed in some states but not in others.

In 1960, 13 states (California, Florida, Illinois, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, West Virginia, and Wisconsin) selected all or some of their delegates through a primary in which voters were also able to express a choice for a presidential candidate. However, in only seven of these states were delegates legally pledged to the results of the primary. In five states the consent of a presidential candidate was required to enter his name in the primary.

Convention Plus Presidential Primary: Two states, Indiana and Maryland, have still another version of the presidential primary. Delegates are selected by state convention, but are pledged to abide by the results of a preferential presidential primary in which voters express their choice of a President. Delegates from Indiana are bound for the first ballot; delegates from Maryland are bound so long as the candidate is a serious contender.

2. NOMINATION OF PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

National party conventions usually meet in July or August of a presidential election year to nominate their candidates for President and Vice President and adopt the party platform. In 1964 the Republican National Convention is scheduled to begin on July 13 in San Francisco, and the Democratic National Convention, on August 24 in Atlantic City.

The national party conventions have no legal basis and are not regulated by federal or state law. They evolved to meet a need for a method of selecting party presidential candidates. The first party nominations were made by congressional caucus, beginning in 1804 and continuing for about 20 years. The caucus was criticized because it enabled a small group of Congressmen to influence the selection of a President. By 1828 all but two states had switched to designating party presidential nominees by the state legislatures and to direct popular election of presidential electors. The first full-fledged national conventions were held by the major parties in 1831 and 1832. National conventions have changed relatively little in form for over 100 years. Their purposes are still the same--to select a presidential and vice presidential party ticket and adopt the party platform.

3. NOMINATION OF ELECTORS

In each state political parties nominate electors for the November general election. Table 2 shows that Louisiana has followed the overwhelming majority of

Table I. METHOD OF SELECTING DELEGATES TO NATIONAL CONVENTIONS*

| State | Party Nomination | | | | General Election Ballot | | Electors Pledged by Law to Vote for Party Presidential Nominee |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Method Perscribed by Law | Committee or Convention | Primary | Other | Names of Electors Appear | Names of Pres. Candidates Appear | |
| Alabama | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | No | |
| Alaska | | Yes | | | No | Yes | Yes |
| Arizona | Yes | | Yes | | Yes | Yes | |
| Arkansas | Yes | Yes | | | No[1] | Yes | |
| California | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | Yes |
| Colorado | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Connecticut | Yes | Yes | | | [2] | [2] | Yes[1] |
| Delaware | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Florida | Yes | | | Yes[3] | No | Yes | Yes[4] |
| Georgia | | Yes | | | Yes | No | |
| Hawaii | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | Yes |
| Idaho | | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | Yes |
| Illinois | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Indiana | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Iowa | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Kansas | Yes | | Yes | | Yes | Yes | |
| Kentucky | [5] | Yes[5] | [5] | | No | Yes | |
| LOUISIANA | [6] | Yes[6] | [6] | [7] | Yes | Yes | |
| Maine | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Maryland | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Massachusetts | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | Yes |
| Michigan | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Minnesota | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Mississippi | Yes[8] | [8] | Yes[8] | | Yes | Yes | [9] |
| Missouri | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Montana | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | |
| Nebraska | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Nevada | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | Yes[1] |
| New Hampshire | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| New Jersey | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| New Mexico | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | Yes[10] |
| New York | Yes | Yes | | | [11] | Yes | |
| North Carolina | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| North Dakota | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | |
| Ohio | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Oklahoma | Yes | Yes[12] | | | Yes | Yes | Yes[1] |
| Oregon | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | Yes |
| Pennsylvania | Yes | | | Yes[13] | No | Yes | |
| Rhode Island | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| South Carolina | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes[14] | |
| South Dakota | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | |
| Tennessee | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | |
| Texas | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Utah | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Vermont | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | |
| Virginia | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | Yes[15] |
| Washington | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| West Virginia | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Wisconsin | Yes | Yes | | | No | Yes | |
| Wyoming | Yes | Yes | | | Yes | Yes | |

*Applicable to 1960 election unless otherwise specified.

[1] Enacted in 1961.

[2] Not specified.

[3] Appointed by the governor, upon recommendation of the state executive committees.

[4] Liable to punishment as a felony if an elector fails to vote for the candidates of the party under whose label he was elected.

[5] Can be chosen at convention or primary, according to party rules.

[6] Manner of nomination is at the discretion of the state central committees. A primary for Democratic electors is authorized for 1964.

[7] If national candidates for President and Vice President do not receive backing of their party state central committee, electors supporting such candidates can be nominated by petition of 1,000 voters.

[8] For 1960 election, electors were nominated by convention. A 1963 act provides that electors be nominated by primary, to be held the first Tuesday in September of a presidential election year. Ten per cent of the membership of a state party convention can propose a slate of electors backing the national presidential nominee, and 10 per cent can propose another slate of electors to appear on the primary ballot.

[9] A 1963 act provides that electors may be designated "unpledged" on the ballot.

[10] Enacted in 1963.

[11] Names of electors do not appear on the ballot where voting machines are authorized. Where voting machines are not authorized, the names of both electors and candidates for President and Vice President are printed on the ballot.

[12] Enacted in 1961. Previously, nomination was by primary.

[13] Nominated by presidential candidate of each party.

[14] Names of candidates for President and Vice President printed on the ballot when requested in the certification or petition nominating electors.

[15] State law provides that electors selected by party convention are expected to vote for nominees of their national party convention unless instructed by their state party convention to vote for other persons.

states (45) in its method of nominating electors, that is, by party committee or convention. However, in Louisiana the method of selection is at the discretion of the party state central committees. Practically all other states prescribe by law the specific method to be used to nominate electors.

In 1960 a primary was used to nominate electors in Arizona and Kansas, and was optional in Kentucky. Since then, Mississippi enacted a law in 1963 establishing a primary, the first to be held on September 1, 1964. A resolution of the Louisiana Democratic State Central Committee calls for a Democratic primary election on July 25, 1964 to nominate electors.

Unique systems to nominate electors are used in Florida and Pennsylvania. In Florida, the governor appoints the party electors upon recommendation of the party state executive committees. Under Pennsylvania's method, electors are nominated by the presidential candidates of each party.

4. PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION (ELECTION OF ELECTORS)

The "presidential election" is held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November--a date set by Congress which next falls on November 3, 1964. Most people feel that the President and Vice President are elected on this day. However, the voters actually elect "electors" who later vote for the President and Vice President.

The U. S. Constitution leaves the selection of electors up to each state "in Such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct . . . ." The only federal qualification is that no member of Congress nor a person holding a federal office of "Trust or Profit" can be appointed an elector.

The Constitution provides that each state has as many electors as it has Senators and Representatives in Congress. There are 435 Representatives and 100 Senators. Since Louisiana has eight Representatives and two Senators, it has 10 electoral votes. The Twenty-third Amendment to the U. S. Constitution, ratified in 1961, grants electoral votes to the District of Columbia. The three electoral votes for the District of Columbia increased the total to 538, and thus a candidate needs 270 to be elected.

A state could provide that electors be elected by district or some other pattern. In practice, however, electors are elected state-wide under the "general ticket" or "unit" system in which a plurality of popular votes wins all of a state's electoral votes. Once some states adopted the unit system, the pattern developed for all states. If any state were to abandon the unit system and split its electoral votes, it would weaken its position. All states have used the unit system since 1892.

It is significant that in about two-thirds of the states, the names of the electors do not even appear on the November presidential ballot. Rather, the ballot shows names of presidential and vice presidential candidates of each party, and a vote for a candidate constitutes a vote for the electors of that party. This is known as the presidential short ballot; Alaska, Arkansas, Hawaii, and Minnesota are some of the latest states to adopt it. On the other hand, Alabama and Georgia prohibit the names of presidential candidates from appearing on the ballot.

5. ELECTORAL COLLEGE VOTE

The electors chosen at the November election meet at a place designated by each state legislature, customarily their state capitols, on the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December--a date fixed by federal law--to cast their electoral votes for President and Vice President. The next electoral votes will be cast on December 14, 1964. Results of the balloting are sent by registered mail to the President of the United States Senate.

The U. S. Constitution makes no requirement as to how electors must vote, except that they must vote separately for President and Vice President, and one of the men for whom they vote cannot be an inhabitant of their home state.

Electors are bound by state law to vote for their party presidential nominee in 12 states (Alaska, California, Connecticut, Florida, Hawaii, Idaho, Massachusetts, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, and Virginia). (See Table 2.) The Florida law makes electors liable to punishment for a felony if they do not vote for their party's candidate. Electors may also be bound through party action, or parties may pick persons as electors whom they feel sure will vote for the party presidential candidate. Moreover, electors may, through their sense of moral obligation, feel compelled to vote for the candidate of the party they represent. There have been rare instances when an elector has refused to vote for the presidential candidate of his party. In recent years there were such occurrences in 1956 and 1960. In no case was the result of the election affected.

The right of a state to require that an elector pledge to vote for his party's presidential candidate was upheld by the United States Supreme Court in 1952 (Ray vs. Blair). The Supreme Court had previously held that electors are not officers or agents of the United States (In re Green). Nevertheless, it is maintained that: "Regardless of any pledge exacted by a State government, or punishment which a State might inflict for failure to observe such a pledge, the vote of a duly accredited elector cast by him as a member of the electoral college must be counted as valid under Federal law." (Nomination and Election of the President and Vice President of the United States, House Document No. 332, 86th Congress, 2d Session.)

6. COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES

Two weeks before the inauguration of a President, on January 6 (or January 7 if the 6th falls on a Sunday), the U. S. Senate and House meet in joint session to count the electoral votes. When the count is completed, the President of the Senate announces the results. If a candidate has a majority of electoral votes (now 270), he is proclaimed President-Elect.

7. ELECTION BY CONGRESS

There is a seventh possible step in electing a President--used only twice in our history (1801 and 1825). If no candidate for President has a majority of electoral votes, then the election is transferred to the U. S. House of Representatives. The U. S. Constitution provides that the House choose the President from the three candidates having the largest number of electoral votes. In such an election, each state has one vote regardless of population. A presidential candidate would have to win the vote of 26 states to be elected. If the House fails to elect a President, then the Vice President acts as President until a President qualifies.

If no candidate for Vice President has a majority of electoral votes, then the Senate chooses from the two top candidates, with each Senator voting as an individual rather than by state.

LOUISIANA PROVISIONS

In Louisiana the selection of delegates to national conventions and the nomination of party presidential electors are left almost entirely to the party state central committees. Members of the state central committees are elected by the people. The governor, however, can have considerable influence over actions of the Democratic State Central Committee.

Delegates to National Conventions

Louisiana has no statutory provisions concerning the selection of delegates to national conventions. Presumably a state central committee could provide that delegates be selected through any method it wished--by the committee itself, by a convention, or by a primary. In practice, delegates to the Democratic National Convention are chosen by the state central committee, usually in May of a presidential election year. The Republicans select district delegates by district conventions and delegates-at-large are selected by a state convention.

Presidential Electors

The Louisiana constitution provides that "Presidential electors . . . shall be chosen or elected in the manner and at the time prescribed by law." However, the law prescribes few details.

State central committees are given complete freedom to decide how party electors are nominated. The law provides that electors "shall be chosen and nominated in any manner determined by a resolution of the state central committee of the respective political party." In the event a state central committee orders presidential electors to be nominated by a convention, then certain procedures are set forth in the law.

If a party's state central committee does not endorse the presidential candidate nominated by the national convention, then Louisiana law provides that electors who do support the national candidate can be placed on the November presidential ballot through nomination papers signed by 1,000 qualified voters. The signers could be independent or affiliated with any party. Names of candidates for "independent" electors can also be placed on the November ballot through nomination papers signed by 1,000 qualified voters.

In choosing electors, two must be from the state at large and one from each of the congressional districts. However, all 10 of Louisiana's electors are voted on state-wide in the November general election. It is not necessary that a voter vote for all 10 electors, nor that he choose all from the same party. However, if he favors a presidential candidate, he weakens the chances of his candidate if he votes for less than 10 electors or splits his vote between parties.

State law provides that electors meet in Baton Rouge to cast their electoral vote, on the day set by Congress. They receive the same per diem pay and travel allowances as legislators, that is, $50 plus 10 cents a mile.

Resolution of the Democratic State Central Committee

In the past, presidential electors whose names appeared on the November ballot usually have been chosen by the state central committees. A departure from this procedure was authorized by resolution of the Democratic State Central Committee at its meeting on September 7, 1963. The resolution provides for the nomination of Democratic presidential electors through a primary to be held on July 25, 1964--the same date as the primary election for members of Congress.

The preface to the resolution declares that: "Whereas, the democratic voters of the State . . . should be given the opportunity to support and vote for presidential electors to support and vote for some outstanding democratic candidates for President and Vice President other than the nominees of the National Democratic Convention, or, if they so choose, for the nominees of the National Democratic Convention . . . ." (Emphasis added.)

However, the resolution simply resolves that "candidates for the Democratic nomination for election to the office of Presidential Elector shall be voted upon at the Democratic Party primary election to be held at the same time as the Democratic congressional primary election in 1964, in accordance with the primary election laws of the State of Louisiana." It further resolves that "the Secretary of State and all other election officials . . . are hereby directed to take such steps as are necessary to receive certifications of and to include on the ballot two separate and distinct slates of candidates for presidential elector as may be provided by this Committee . . . ." (Emphasis added.)

COMPARISON OF COMMITTEE RESOLUTION WITH HB 222

The resolution adopted by the Democratic State Central Committee differs in several respects from House Bill 222 which was defeated in the 1963 session.

1. The resolution adopted by the Democratic State Central Committee applies only to the selection of presidential electors who will bear the state's Democratic label and only to the 1964 election. HB 222 would have provided that all political parties in all future presidential elections nominate their presidential electors by direct primary election.

2. The resolution provides that the date of the primary for nomination of party electors be at the 1964 primary congressional election--scheduled under law to be held on July 25, 1964. Originally, HB 222 also provided that the primary be at the July congressional election, but the bill was amended in the senate to change the election date to August 15, 1964.

3. The resolution requires that the primary ballot contain two separate and distinct slates of candidates for presidential elector, the candidates to be chosen by the committee. Under HB 222, there would have been no restriction on the number of candidates for elector in the primary, nor was there a provision that candidates be identified or grouped by slate.

HB 222 provided for a second primary for candidates failing to receive a majority in the first primary. Under provisions of the resolution, no second primary would be necessary since there would be only two candidates for each position.

4. The resolution does not affect present state law which provides a fairly easy method for a presidential candidate to have names of electors supporting him appear on the November ballot in the event he is not endorsed by the state central committee. He can do this by having "1,000 qualified voters" throughout the state sign nominating papers for electors; the same 1,000 could sign for each of the 10 electors. Under HB 222, only "independent" voters (those not affiliated with a party) could have signed such nomination papers. Since there are few independent voters in Louisiana, this could have been difficult.

5. The resolution does not affect present law which provides that the names of candidates for President and Vice President of a party appear on the November general election ballot. HB 222 would have repealed this provision.

6. The resolution does not affect present law which permits independent candidates to run for office. HB 222 would have repealed present provisions for placing the names of independent candidates on a general election ballot--not only for presidential elector but also for any other office--national, state, district, parish, municipal, or ward.

7. The resolution does not prevent the formation of new parties in Louisiana, a process which is permitted under present law. HB 222 was so written that no new parties could have been established.

IMPLICATIONS OF THE RESOLUTION

The resolution adopted by the Democratic State Central Committee could be changed before July 25, 1964, when the primary election for presidential electors is scheduled.

1. A new state central committee could rescind or change action of the previous one. Terms of the present committeemen will expire January 26, 1964.

2. The state legislature will meet May 11, 1964--also in advance of the July 25 primary. Both the federal and state constitutions designate the state legislature as the appropriate body to determine the manner of selecting electors. The legislature could change present law which allows party central committees to decide how electors are nominated, and provide instead a method spelled out in the law.

If the present resolution does remain in effect, several issues are raised:

1. The primary would be held on July 25, a month before the Democratic National Convention which is scheduled to begin August 24. Thus, Louisiana voters would be called upon to decide on the Democratic presidential electors before the Democratic presidential and vice presidential candidates were nominated. The Republican nominees would be known, since the Republican National Convention meets on July 13.

2. It is not certain what will appear on the July primary ballot insofar as presidential electors are concerned. The resolution provides for "two separate and distinct slates of candidates for presidential elector," to be designated by the committee. It implies that one slate would be pledged to the presidential and vice presidential nominees of the Democratic National Convention, and the other slate would contain names of persons who would support some other candidates for President and Vice President. However, the resolution does not make it clear whether the names of the presidential candidate other than the national nominee would be shown on the ballot, or whether the slate of electors would be unpledged and therefore free to decide later whom they would support. If the slate of electors were pledged to a candidate other than the national nominee, then there would be no unpledged electors on the July ballot. The names of the presidential and vice presidential nominees of the Democratic National Convention could not be shown on the primary ballot, since they would not be known at the time of the July election.

3. The results of the July primary could influence Louisiana delegates in their voting on a presidential candidate at the Democratic convention in August. The primary, even though for the purpose of nominating Democratic presidential electors, could serve the same purpose as a preferential presidential primary in that it would indicate the voters' views.

4. There would be a possibility of having a split electoral vote. Voters in the primary might choose some electors from one slate and other electors from the second slate. The electors chosen at the primary would be under the Democratic label in the November general election.

5. The resolution does not state whether the candidates for elector selected by the state central committee would have to pledge to vote for the presidential candidate whom they represented on the ballot. A pledge would give more assurance that the wishes of the voters would be carried out by the electors who won the primary.

6. The majority of committeemen could select, for the slate they did not favor, persons who would be unpopular with the voters. This would give an unfair advantage to the slate that the majority of committeemen favored.

7. Still another question is raised regarding the type of primary to be held under the state central committee's resolution. Louisiana primaries, traditionally and under the primary election laws, are open to all persons wishing to be candidates if they are members of the party and meet other qualifications of the office they seek. The primary authorized by the Democratic State Central Committee would be limited to only those persons picked by the committee.

Since the primary would be unique, it is not certain under Louisiana's present primary law whether voters would have to vote for all 10 electors in order to have their vote count. The present law on plural candidates, which requires a vote be cast on all places to be filled for that position, applies to election from political districts or subdivisions; electors would be elected state-wide.

8. A question can be raised regarding the constitutionality of allowing party committees to decide how presidential electors are to be nominated. Both the United States and Louisiana constitutions stipulate that the legislature is to decide how electors are to be chosen. It has been argued by some that it is an improper delegation of legislative authority to allow the state central committees to decide the method of nominating electors.

Moreover, the 1963 Louisiana legislature did not approve proposed legislation (HB 222) to change the method of nominating electors. Yet only a few months after the defeat of HB 222, the Democratic State Central Committee departed from the traditional method of nomination by the committee. This raises the question: Is action of the committee calling for a primary to nominate electors contrary to the wishes of the legislature?

RECOMMENDATIONS

Our democracy is built on the principle that ultimate power rests with the people. This is never more evident than when voters choose those who will govern them. No governmental position of leadership is more important than the office of President of the United States.

The following recommendations are made regarding the role of the voter in Louisiana in selecting a President:

1. The legislature should spell out in state law a specific method for nominating presidential electors. This would assure that the method of selection would be known and not subject to sudden change by any party state central committee.

2. The method prescribed by law should provide that the party state central committees choose nominees for party presidential electors. The members of state central committees are elected by the people and therefore should represent the views of the people.

3. Louisiana voters should be assured the opportunity to vote on candidates of the major national parties in the November general election, whether or not their party state central committee endorses the national candidate. Present state law should be retained which provides a method for electors pledged to a national candidate, electors pledged to a candidate other than the national nominee, and "unpledged electors" to get on the November ballot.

The law could be made more explicit in several instances, however. For example, it is not clear from present wording regarding "independent" electors running from a district rather than at large whether the 1,000 voters who sign the nominating papers would have to reside in the district from which the elector was running. The law should be clarified to provide that 1,000 qualified voters throughout the state could sign nominating papers for any presidential elector. The law should also stipulate that the same 1,000 voters who sign the nominating papers for one presidential elector could also sign for the other nine electors comprising a slate.

4. The present state law which provides that names of candidates for President and Vice President appear on the November ballot should be retained. This provision makes it easier for some voters to identify the electors, and thus express their choice for President and Vice President.

---

Mr. Staige D. Blackford, Res. Dir.
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N.W.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Public Affairs Research Council of Louisiana, Inc.
603 Commerce Bldg. • P. O. Box 2148 • DI 3-8204
BATON ROUGE 1, LOUISIANA

NON-PROFIT ORG.
U. S. Postage PAID
Baton Rouge, La.
Permit No. 330

Iuff. (Tenn.) Sonit

1963

Operation Freedom Expands Its Aid Program ....

—Southern Patriot Map

In expanding its aid program, Operation Freedom did not have far to go, for Haywood and Fayette Counties (where Operation Freedom had for two years been working) is next to the Tennessee-Mississippi line, and borders on the Mississippi Delta — an area which includes 18 counties lying between Memphis and Vicksburg. This alluvial plain, in the state of Mississippi, should not be confused with the delta of the river itself — which is in Louisiana (see insert map).

The Mississippi Delta is considered to be the core of the segregation problem in the United States. At its center is the large plantation of U. S. Senator James O. Eastland who leads the attacks on integrationists and others who believe in civil rights. Not far from his plantation, in Indianola, the White Citizens Council movement had its origin. Jackson, the state capital, is on the southeastern edge of the Delta. Oxford, home of Ole Miss, is on the northeastern edge.

WHILE CONTINUING

IN WEST TENNESSEE,

OPERATION FREEDOM

MOVES INTO MISSISSIPPI

What does the future hold for this little boy?

WHEN OPERATION FREEDOM BEGAN

In the spring of 1961, when landlords in Haywood and Fayette Counties, Tenn., were evicting Negroes who registered to vote and banks were cutting off their credit, a group of concerned citizens came together in Cincinnati, Ohio and formed an organization to help.

The organization was called Operation Freedom. It launched a nationwide drive to raise money to enable the Negroes of West Tennessee to survive economically as they organized to win their freedom at the ballot box.

During the past two years, Operation Freedom has loaned about $80,000 to Negroes (and a few white supporters also suffering reprisals) in Haywood and Fayette Counties. Ten times that much could have been put to good use, but with what was available Operation Freedom has made it possible for scores of families who would otherwise have had to leave to stay in West Tennessee.

EXPANDS INTO MISSISSIPPI

Now the problem that Operation Freedom was set up to meet has expanded into the Mississippi Delta, and Operation Freedom is expanding with it. It has voted to extend its operations into the Delta area and attempt to do there what it has been doing and will continue to do in Tennessee; in the words of its charter, "promote brotherhood, especially by helping to secure the economic conditions conducive to the free exercise of civil rights."

This home of a sharecropper on a plantation between Ruleville and Cleveland, Mississippi, is typical of thousands.

The need in the Delta is crucial; its dimensions are tremendous. To meet it even partially, Operation Freedom will need more money than it has ever had before. But, in the words of one official of the organization, "the task is too important to the entire future of democracy for us to even think of saying 'we can't.'"

And the need in the two Tennessee counties also remains crucial. The people there have maintained a steady, patient struggle while continually undergoing pressure that has never let up.

18-COUNTY AREA

The Delta area of Mississippi covers 18 counties (see map) and includes some of the richest farming land in the world. Each year nearly one half billion dollars worth of cotton is farmed in this area. Here live approximately 300,000 Negroes — about two-thirds of the total population and in some counties as much as 80 per cent.

Until recently, virtually no Negroes in this area were registered to vote, and the number is still minute because officials use every possible device to prevent it. For example, in Sunflower County there are 30,000 Negroes, of whom 13,000 are of voting age. Of these 13,000 only 141 were registered at the end of 1962. But in the past year intensive registration drives have been launched in the area by several civil rights organizations.

ECONOMIC REPRISALS AND VIOLENCE

When the registration efforts stepped up, the reprisals began. In some cases there has been violence; homes have been shot into; two student registration workers in LeFlore County narrowly escaped being lynched.

But when people make up their minds to be free, terror of this kind won't stop them. The most effective weapon the segregationists have — and they know it — is economic pressure. In the Delta, as in West Tennessee, people who try to register are being put off the land, fired from their jobs, and cut off from credit.

While working in West Tennessee during the past two years, Operation Freedom personnel have been subject to much harassment from local police and have even been jailed. Rev. Maurice McCrackin, treasurer, was arrested in late 1961 on a false charge and jailed for more than 40 days.

OPERATION FREEDOM'S PROGRAM

Operation Freedom proposes to defeat this weapon with a fund that will be used to (1) enable those who have land to make their crops when banks cut them off from credit, (2) stop foreclosures on homes and farm equipment, (3) help landless Negroes who lose their jobs survive until a permanent solution is found.

Three well-known leaders in the Delta, Aaron Henry, Bob Moses, and Amzie Moore, are among those working with Operation Freedom in setting up the necessary machinery. The money from Operation Freedom is generally made available to those who need it in the form of loans, although outright grants are sometimes made when it is necessary. Local committees will process loan applications. The loan fund is revolving, and as loans are repaid, the money can be loaned out again.

It should be noted that no funds for administrative costs of Operation Freedom are taken out of the money raised for the loan fund. Every cent given in response to appeals goes to the people in Tennessee and Mississippi. Administrative funds are raised occasionally through special appeals for that purpose.

SOME PEOPLE OPERATION FREEDOM HAS HELPED

In Haywood and Fayette Counties, Tennessee, Operation Freedom has provided loans for planting crops, loans for living expenses until crops could be harvested, loans to save farms, equipment, and homes from foreclosure, and funds for objects of community need, such as wells. Also provided were tents for both counties, wooden floors for the tents, wiring, etc. (The tent city in Haywood County no longer exists.)

Operation Freedom provided funds to build this house for David Mac Jones, oldest voter in Haywood County, Tenn., when he and wife were evicted in 1961 from land on which he had lived since childhood.

In the Mississippi Delta, Operation Freedom has begun helping Negro sharecroppers and workers. Some people Operation Freedom has helped:

A man in a small Delta town was employed in the city sanitation department. His wife went to register to vote. He was fired; she lost her job as a cleaning woman in a public building. They have a son; they own their house but have an $800 mortgage on it. Occasionally they get odd jobs; nationwide food drives have helped them to eat. Operation Freedom has loaned them $120 to take care of food and living expenses for a two month period. Asked how she feels about registering after all the trouble she has had, this woman said: "I feel wonderful about it. I'd do it over again."

Another man, his wife, and seven children worked on a plantation. His mother and sister tried to register; he was fired. He then got a job in a plant. People from the plantation found out about it and got him fired. Meanwhile his wife got a job as a cook in the cafeteria of a white school. Someone who had known her on the plantation saw her there and got her fired. She told Operation Freedom: "I don't know how we will live; we have no money and no food." Operation Freedom has loaned $65 as a monthly subsidy for a two month period. It is hoped that a permanent solution can be found.

Although the district where Negroes live in Cleveland, Miss., is near the heart of the city, it has unpaved roads, open ditches, unpainted frame houses, and unlit streets at night.

A man who owns a few acres of land and who has been extremely active in the voter registration campaign, found bank loans unavailable to him. In December of 1962 the balance owed on his tractor came due. Operation Freedom loaned him nearly $300 in order to pay this balance and save his tractor from foreclosure. Without a tractor, he would have been unable to farm his land.

Multiply these cases by the hundreds and you get a picture of the problems in the Delta. Economic strangulation is the only weapon strong enough to defeat these people; if the people who believe in democracy provide the money to help them defeat this weapon, they will win. It is as simple as that.

An emergency program like that of Operation Freedom cannot solve the problem forever. For Negroes without jobs or land there must eventually be other solutions — perhaps cooperatives, government redevelopment programs, and new industry. But these things take time, and meanwhile people must live this year and next if they are to stay. Operation Freedom can provide this stop-gap.

It can also let the Negroes of Mississippi know they are not alone, let them know that as they lift their eyes toward freedom there are people all over America, white and Negro, who are grateful for their courage, and who care enough to give of their own substance in support.

OFFICERS AND BOARD MEMBERS

Officers of Operation Freedom are: Rev. Clarence T. R. Nelson, chairman; Miriam Nicholas, co-chairman; Rev. L. Richard Hudson, secretary; Rev. Maurice F. McCrackin, treasurer; Ernest Bromley, corresponding secretary; Jack McKart, coordinator.

Board members are: Rev. J. W. Adams, Anne Braden, Rabbi Stanley Brav, Pauline Brokaw, Lloyd Danzeisen, U. S. Fowler, Lois Haswell, Virgie Hortenstine, Paul Laprad, Howard Lipton, Carlton Mabee, Rev. M. J. Mangham, Wallace Nelson, Rev. Wilbur Page, Marjorie Ruben, Mrs. Donald Spencer, Alfred C. Stone, Rev. John Wilson.

After 35 years on one plantation, this woman was driven off the land for registering to vote. She is typical of many.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

Operation Freedom appeals to people throughout the nation to help it meet the challenge in Mississippi and West Tennessee. This is what you can do:

1. Send money to Operation Freedom, c/o Rev. Maurice McCrackin, 932 Dayton Street, Cincinnati 14, Ohio, to assist those harassed for trying to vote. Make your gift as generous as you can, but do not let the magnitude of the need make you feel that only large gifts are solicited. Whether yours is a dollar or several thousand dollars, it is needed.

2. Send to Operation Freedom suggested names of persons and organizations to whom they may appeal for funds.

3. Write to Operation Freedom at the above address, obtain additional literature and take this matter up with your church, with other organizations to which you belong, and with your individual friends.

4. Order descriptive literature from Operation Freedom and do your own mailing to a list of your friends or enclose in a regular mailing to your organization. Operation Freedom runs on a shoestring, so has little money for postage.

(All contributions to Operation Freedom are deductible for income tax purposes)

February 1963

---

address here

Janet - please make us a photocopy of this + file in
Gen. Research

Suff. Southern
1963

MH ✓
WB ✓ JH ✓
RB JS ✓
SB ✓
BP

FACT SHEET:

VOTING AND POLITICS IN THE SOUTH WITH REFERENCE TO THE NEGRO CITIZEN

Prepared by Herman H. Long
Race Relations Department of the American Missionary Association, United Church of Christ, Fisk University

1963

Suff. Southern

INTRODUCTION

The following thirteen tables contain a selection of important data which relate to the matter of voting and politics in the South in reference to the Negro citizen. They have been prepared for the Workshop of Negro College Educators for two primary reasons: (a) to serve as background information for a major presentation in one of the scheduled seminars of the total workshop group, and (b) to be used in the more detailed analysis and discussion of a small interest group in the field of voting and politics. In considering the problems and issues which have implication for adult Negro leadership and adult education, there is perhaps no set of interests of greater importance than those which lie in this field. We are dealing here not only with the basic process through which public policies are reached and critical decisions made, but also with the potential and actual forces influencing these decisions. If democratic government is the expression of the will of the people, as indeed we believe it should always attempt to be ideally, then politics is the essential vehicle for the articulation of that will. Our task as citizens, and certainly the task of education in confronting the demand for enlightened political performance, then becomes one of responsible choice and action toward a politically viable and free community in which the many and different interests find expression and enter into the marketplace of political debate and consensus.

Until the very recent years, the Negro citizen has had, at best, an indirect relationship to this process and minimal influence in determining its outcome. As recently as 1940, it is estimated that there were only about 200,000 to 250,000 Negro registered voters in the South; and yet in this same year more than three-fourths (77 percent) of the nation's total Negro population. The 1948 Democratic National Convention gave rise to the civil rights issue as a major domestic question for the first time since the reconstruction era. Although it had long existed as a moral question and as a kind of subliminal political issue, this was its first modern expression which invited a public response upon which would hang, in the long-run, the destiny of national political development. It was, in essence, a recognition of the reality that the Negro had become an important entity and force in national politics -- all in major part due to the cumulative effects of Negro migration northward and westward and concentration of the Negro population in strategic states whose combined electoral votes play a determining role in the outcome of national elections.

In every national election since 1948 the Negro vote has played, in more or less degree, a balance of power role; and in at least two of these elections the heavy urban northern Negro vote has been a central feature of the outcome. A resource of tremendous potential has therefore emerged in the hands of Negro citizens and Negro leaders which can be directly used to advance long-delayed objectives for full and equal citizenship rights. This is, by almost any standard, the major departure and most important frontier now at hand. But the lines of advance and attack have shifted from the North to the South where the greatest lag exists in Negro voter and political strength and where, at the same time, there is the greatest unused potential and lack of political sophistication.

Estimates of 1958 place Negro voter registration in the eleven most traditional southern states at 1,281,818. Although this represents a tremendous gain over 200,000 or more who had qualified in 1940, it remains only about a fourth of the potential Negro electorate in the 21 years old and over Negro population. White registered voters for these states are between seven and eight times the Negro figure, even though white registration rates are below those of other regions. A practical and immediate task is that of increasing the number of Negro qualified voters, not only insofar as Negro political strength and activity are concerned but also as regards the possibility of bringing about fundamental changes in the political system of the region, which has rested upon single-party domination, on the one hand, and rural domination on the other.

Several important concerns are raised out of these developments which have implication for Negro education in general and adult education efforts in particular. The exploration of these concerns will constitute a primary objective of the workshop and the special study and discussion group which will have assignment in this area. Some of these concerns are:

1. What role, if any, does Negro education, broadly conceived have in the area of politics, especially in matters of (a) political leadership, (b) political action, (c) political decision, and (d) citizenship education?

2. Would a two-party South correct the many political weaknesses which now exist in the region? What trends seem now apparent toward the development of a real Republican party in the region, and from what sources is this development presently coming? What broad guidelines of strategy may be suggested for Negro leadership in this regard?

3. What are the general implications of reapportionment and what will this development mean in the long-run objectives and plans of Negro political leadership?

4. What is meant by Negro bloc voting? If and when this does occur, is it sound strategy? What are the weaknesses and assets?

5. Should Negroes, from the standpoint of strategy, ally themselves with the present Democratic party, with the emerging Republican party, or become an effective group of Political Independents?

6. What can colleges do in the area of political education and in efforts to produce effective voter registration programs?

I. SIZE OF THE SOUTHERN ELECTORATE

TABLE A -- Regional Voter Potential

| | Total Pop. | 21 Yrs. Old and over | % | Cong. Dist. | El. Votes | Party |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| All States (14) | 50,020,456 | 28,810,148 | 57.6 | 122 | 150 | |
| Ala. | 3,266,740 | 1,834,378 | 56.1 | 9 | 11 | D* |
| Ark. | 1,786,272 | 1,043,269 | 58.4 | 6 | 8 | D |
| Del. | 446,292 | 267,249 | 59.9 | 1 | 3 | D |
| Fla. | 4,951,560 | 3,087,699 | 53.0 | 8 | 10 | R |
| Ga. | 3,943,116 | 2,231,325 | 56.6 | 10 | 12 | D |
| Ky. | 3,038,156 | 1,763,644 | 58.0 | 8 | 10 | R |
| La. | 3,257,022 | 1,803,805 | 55.4 | 8 | 10 | D |
| Md. | 3,100,689 | 1,845,067 | 59.5 | 7 | 9 | D |
| Miss. | 2,178,141 | 1,170,522 | 53.7 | 6 | 8 | * |
| N. C. | 4,556,155 | 2,556,884 | 56.1 | 12 | 14 | D |
| S.C. | 2,382,594 | 1,266,251 | 53.1 | 6 | 8 | D |
| Tenn. | 3,567,089 | 2,092,891 | 58.7 | 9 | 11 | R |
| Tex. | 9,579,677 | 5,534,277 | 57.8 | 22 | 24 | D |
| Va. | 3,966,949 | 2,312,887 | 58.3 | 10 | 12 | R |
| | | (Border) | | | | |
| Okla. | 2,328,284 | 1,416,050 | 60.8 | 6 | 8 | R* |
| Mo. | 4,319,813 | 2,695,614 | 62.4 | 11 | 13 | D |
| W. Va. | 1,860,421 | 1,083,347 | 58.2 | 6 | 8 | D |

Source: Congressional District Data Book, 1960

*These states had votes cast for favored "states rights" candidate Harry F. Byrd who received 6 of Alabama's 11 votes; all of Mississippi's, and 1 of Oklahoma's 8. Total electorate votes cast, 1960: 219 R; 303 D; and 15 S.R. (537).

TABLE B -- Negro Voter Potential in Region

| | Negro Pop. Total * | % | 21 Years and over | % |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| All States (14) | 10,767,112 | 21.5 | 5,406,206 | 50.2 |
| Ala. | 983,131 | 30.1 | 481.320 | 48.9 |
| Ark. | 390,569 | 21.9 | 192,626 | 49.3 |
| Del. | 61,965 | 13.6 | 33,999 | 54.8 |
| Fla. | 887,679 | 17.9 | 470,261 | 53.0 |
| Ga. | 1,125,893 | 28.6 | 559,984 | 49.7 |
| Ky. | 218,073 | 7.2 | 125,627 | 37.6 |
| La. | 1,045,307 | 32.1 | 514,589 | 49.2 |
| Md. | 526,770 | 17.0 | 283,906 | 53.9 |
| Miss. | 920,595 | 42.3 | 422,256 | 45.9 |
| N. C. | 1,156,870 | 25.4 | 550,929 | 47.6 |
| S. C. | 831,572 | 34.9 | 371,104 | 44.6 |
| Tenn. | 589,336 | 16.5 | 313,873 | 53.3 |
| Tex. | 1,204,846 | 12.6 | 649,512 | 53.9 |
| Va. | 824,506 | 20.8 | 436,720 | 53.0 |
| | (Border) | | | |
| Okla. | 220,384 | 9.5 | 114,964 | 52.2 |
| Mo. | 396,846 | 9.0 | 222,333 | 56.0 |
| W. Va. | 90,288 | 4.8 | 49,655 | 55.0 |

* Figures are for non-white totals, including the percentages. In remaining states, including 3 border states in table, Negro population totals - 9,724,331.

Note: Including 2 border states in table, non-white population 21 years old and over in rest of U. S. is 5,559,529 or 57.1 percent.

TABLE C -- Negro Registrations: 11 States

| | 1958* | 1956 | 1952 | 1947 |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| All States | 1,281,818 | 1,238,038 | 1,008,614 | 595,000 |
| Alabama | 73,272 | 53,366 | 25,224 | 6,000 |
| Arkansas | 64,023 | 69,677 | 61,413 | 47,000 |
| Florida | 144,861 | 148,703 | 120,900 | 149,000 |
| Georgia | 161,082 | 163,389 | 144,835 | 125,000 |
| Louisiana | 132,506 | 161,410 | 120,000 | 10,000 |
| Mississippi | 19,347 | 20,000 | 20,000 | 5,000 |
| N. Carolina | 157,991 | 135,000 | 100,000 | 75,000 |
| S. Carolina | 57,893 | 99,890 | 80,000 | 50,000 |
| Tennessee | 150,869 | 90,000 | 85,000 | 80,000 |
| Texas | 226,495 | 214,000 | 181,916 | 100,000 |
| Virginia | 93,479 | 82,603 | 69,326 | 48,000 |

* 1958 figures from Report of U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, 1959. All others from study by Southern Regional Council: The Negro Voter in the South, 1959.

 From 1960 Report of U. S. Civil Rights Commission.

Note: 1958 figure represents 3.5 percent gain over 1956 (43,780 voters)
27.0 percent gain over 1952 (273,204 voters)
115.4 percent gain over 1947 (686,818 voters)

1956 figure represents 18.5 percent gain over 1952 (229,424 voters)
51.9 percent gain over 1947 (643,038 voters)

1952 figure represents 41.0 percent gain over 1947 (413,614 voters).

TABLE D -- Number of Negro and White Registrants

10 States

| | White | Negro | Percent Negroes of Whites |
|---|---|---|---|
| Alabama | 828,946 | 73,272 | 8.8 |
| Arkansas | 499,955 | 64,023 | 14.2 |
| Florida | 1,448,543 | 144,861 | 10.0 |
| Georgia | 1,130,515 | 161,082 | 14.2 |
| Louisiana | 828,686 | 132,506 | 15.9 |
| Mississippi | | 19,347 | |
| N. Carolina | 1,389,831 | 157,991 | 11.3 |
| S. Carolina | 481,023 | 57,893 | 12.0 |
| Texas | 1,489,841 | 226,495 | 15.2 |
| Virginia | 864,863 | 93,479 | 10.8 |

Source: Report of U. S. Civil Rights Commission, 1959.

TABLE E -- Comparison of Negro and White Registrants: Percentage of Population 21 Years Old and Over Registered in 10 States

| | Negro | White |
|---|---|---|
| Alabama | 14.2 | 67.3 |
| Arkansas | 28.1 | 56.8 |
| Florida | 39.5 | 99.4 |
| Georgia | 25.8 | 72.7 |
| Louisiana | 27.5 | 74.9 |
| Mississippi | 3.9 | |
| N. Carolina | 28.7 | 78.9 |
| S. Carolina | 14.8 | 63.2 |
| Texas | 38.8 | 49.0 |
| Virginia | 21.7 | 53.8 |

Source: Report of U. S. Civil Rights Commission, 1959.

II. CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT DATA

TABLE F -- Nonwhite Population Percentage by Congressional Districts -- 12 States

| Cong. Districts | Ala. | Ark. | Ga. | Fla. | Ky. | La. | Miss. | N.C. | S.C. | Tenn. | Tex. | Va. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | 38.6 | 32.3 | 37.5 | 11.6 | 10.3 | 32.4 | 32.2 | 43.8 | 44.0 | 2.7 | 26.7 | 29.1 |
| 2 | 36.0 | 11.9 | 38.8 | 27.8 | 6.3 | 31.0 | 49.6 | 50.5 | 37.3 | 6.1 | 21.6 | 28.3 |
| 3 | 39.3 | 2.1 | 32.3 | 23.0 | 12.8 | 23.7 | 65.5 | 29.6 | 24.6 | 13.3 | 24.7 | 25.8 |
| 4 | 31.7 | 29.4 | 30.7 | 14.5 | 6.8 | 37.4 | 46.4 | 27.8 | 21.3 | 8.0 | 14.2 | 48.0 |
| 5 | 15.8 | 18.5 | 26.5 | 17.3 | 2.7 | 40.5 | 41.2 | 24.3 | 33.5 | 19.2 | 14.7 | 23.2 |
| 6 | 38.7 | 29.9 | 41.3 | 19.3 | 10.1 | 35.4 | 23.8 | 23.1 | 46.6 | 13.0 | 22.1 | 13.6 |
| 7 | 9.9 | | 3.7 | 16.0 | 1.1 | 26.0 | | 35.6 | | 25.2 | 27.7 | 8.2 |
| 8 | 16.0 | | 27.3 | 25.2 | 2.7 | 29.1 | | 22.4 | | 26.3 | 26.1 | 24.4 |
| 9 | 34.6 | | 7.2 | | | | | 12.5 | | 36.4 | 17.8 | 2.7 |
| 10 | | | 32.9 | | | | | 17.9 | | | 15.0 | 6.5 |
| 11 | | | | | | | | 13.0 | | | 15.0 | |
| 12 | | | | | | | | 7.6 | | | 11.1 | |
| 13 | | | | | | | | | | | 5.6 | |
| 14 | | | | | | | | | | | 4.7 | |
| 15 | | | | | | | | | | | .5 | |
| 16 | | | | | | | | | | | 4.2 | |
| 17 | | | | | | | | | | | 3.5 | |
| 18 | | | | | | | | | | | 4.0 | |
| 19 | | | | | | | | | | | 6.2 | |
| 20 | | | | | | | | | | | 6.9 | |
| 21 | | | | | | | | | | | 2.9 | |
| 22 | | | | | | | | | | | 15.0 | |
| Entire State | 30.1 | 21.9 | 28.6 | 17.9 | 7.2 | 32.1 | 42.3 | 25.4 | 34.9 | 16.5 | 12.6 | 20.8 |
| No. Dist. | 9 | 6 | 10 | 8 | 8 | 8 | 6 | 12 | 6 | 9 | 22 | 10 |
| No. where nonwhites exceed 10% | 8 | 4 | 8 | 8 | 3 | 8 | 6 | 11 | 6 | 6 | 13 | 7 |

III. VOTER PARTICIPATION

TABLE G -- Average of All Citizens 21 and Over Voting in Presidential, Gubernatorial and Senatorial Elections for years between 1920-46 -- 11 states with Comparisons for New York and Ohio

| | President | Governor | Senator |
|---|---|---|---|
| Alabama | 18 | 30 | 12 |
| Arkansas | 20 | 31 | 20 |
| Florida | 32 | 43 | 25 |
| Georgia | 16 | 29 | 16 |
| Louisiana | 22 | 54 | 20 |
| Mississippi | 14 | 56 | 13 |
| N. Carolina | 43 | 28 | 19 |
| S. Carolina | 10 | 48 | 27 |
| Tennessee | 29 | 20 | 17 |
| Texas | 27 | 34 | 26 |
| Virginia | 23 | 15 | |
| National Average | 58 | | |
| New York | 69 | 57 | 60 |
| Ohio | 68 | 58 | 57 |

Adapted from figures in Southern Politics, by V. O. Key, Jr.

TABLE H -- Vote Cast for U. S. Senators - 1958 and 1960 Elections with Percent for Majority Party -- 12 State with New York and Ohio Comparisons.

| State | Vote | Percent of 21 Years and Over | Percent Majority Party |
|---|---|---|---|
| Ala. | 554,000* | 30.2 | 70.2 |
| Ark. | 377,000* | 36.1 | 100.0 |
| Fla. | 542,000 | 17.6 | 71.2 |
| Ga. | 576,000* | 25.8 | 100.0 |
| Ky. | 1,089,000* | 61.7 | 59.2 R |
| La. | 542,000* | 30.0 | 79.8 |
| Miss. | 266,000* | 22.7 | 91.8 |
| N. C. | 1,291,000* | 50.0 | 61.4 |
| S. C. | 330,000* | 26.0 | 100.0 |
| Tenn. | 829,000* | 39.6 | 71.8 |
| Tex. | 2,254,000* | 40.7 | 58.0 |
| Va. | 622,000* | 26.9 | 81.4 |
| | | . . . . . | |
| N. Y. | 5,602,000 | 51.4 | 50.7 R |
| Ohio | 3,149,000 | 53.9 | 52.5 |

* 1960 Elections.

 Had Republican opposing candidates.

Source: Statistical Abstract of the U. S., 1961.

IV. VOTING AND POLITICAL BEHAVIOR

TABLE I -- Comparison of Voting in Metropolitan (Urban) and Rural Counties With Similar Percentage of Negro Population.

| Metropolitan County | Percent Voting | Rural County | Percent Voting | Ratio Rural-Urban |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Fulton (Atlanta) | 14.1 | Evans | 32.4 | 2.30 |
| Hillsboro (Tampa) | 28.3 | Charlotte | 64.6 | 2.28 |
| Bexar (San Antonio) | 23.5 | Franklin | 53.0 | 2.25 |
| Dade (Miami) | 30.6 | Okeechobee | 67.8 | 2.21 |
| Dallas (Dallas) | 18.1 | Tyler | 38.1 | 2.10 |
| Jefferson (B'ham) | 14.7 | Elmore | 30.0 | 2.04 |
| Harris (Houston) | 21.3 | Chambers | 43.0 | 2.01 |
| Duval (Jacksonville) | 31.6 | Citrus | 62.8 | 1.99 |
| Tarrant (Ft. Worth) | 25.1 | Calhoun | 49.5 | 1.97 |
| Pulaski (Little Rock) | 17.9 | Lonoke | 34.2 | 1.91 |
| Orleans (New Orleans) | 42.7 | Caldwell | 53.5 | 1.77 |
| Charleston (Charleston) | 31.7 | Hampton | 55.0 | 1.73 |
| Caddo (Shreveport) | 24.5 | Plaquemine | 42.4 | 1.73 |
| Davidson (Nashville) | 14.1 | Trousdale | 21.8 | 1.55 |
| Hinds (Jackson) | 18.8 | Amite | 28.2 | 1.50 |
| Knox (Knoxville) | 28.2 | McNairy | 39.0 | 1.38 |
| Mecklenburg (Charlotte) | 18.8 | Lee | 40.3 | 1.09 |
| Hamilton (Chattanooga) | 28.2 | Crockett | 21.9 | 1.05 |
| Richmond | 10.8 | Culpepper | 9.3 | .86 |
| Shelby | 24.8 | Hardeman | 18.9 | .76 |
| Norfolk | 9.6 | King George | 6.5 | .67 |

Source: Southern Politics by V. O. Key, Jr.

TABLE J -- Patterns of Rural Activity in Relation to Negro Population Percentage - Alabama and South Carolina: Counties of Highest White Participation.*

State Av.- 30.3

| Alabama | | Percent Negro Population |
|---|---|---|
| (Counties in 1st quartile of participation) | | |
| Bullock | | 73.6 |
| Choctaw | | 52.5 |
| Clark | | 49.7 |
| Greene | | 83.0 |
| Hale | | 70.3 |
| Lowndes (66.7) | | 82.2 |
| Marengo | | 69.4 |
| Perry | | 67.5 |
| Sumpter | | 76.1 |
| South Carolina (Counties of Highest Participation) | | |
| | (Rates) | |
| Calhoun | 71.2 | 73.1 |
| Allendale | 89.0 | 72.2 |
| Clarendon | 76.2 | 71.7 |
| McCormick | 80.9 | 67.9 |
| Beaufort | 47.7 | 67.1 |
| Williamsburg | 72.5 | 66.5 |
| Lee | 91.5 | 65.5 |

*Adopted from Southern Politics, V. O. Key, Jr., - based upon data from 1930, 1938, 1942 elections.

TABLE K -- Rural Control: The Georgia County Unit System

| County Groups Established by 1917 Law | Unit Votes Each | Percent in Each Group of Counties of States: Total Population | Adult White | Total Unit Votes |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 8 Most Populous Counties | 6 | 30.1 | 34.1 | 11.7 |
| 30 Next Most Populous | 4 | 26.4 | 26.0 | 29.3 |
| 121 Remaining | 2 | 43.5 | 39.9 | 59.0 |

Popular Votes Cast 1946, Per Unit Vote by Group Types

| | |
|---|---|
| Group I | |
| Fulton | 14,092 |
| Chatham | 6,751 |
| DeKalb | 4,462 |
| Group II | |
| Cobb | 2,933 |
| Hall | 2,184 |
| Laurens | 1,967 |
| Group III | |
| Quitman | 299 |
| Towns | 296 |
| Chattahoochee | 132 |

Adapted from Southern Politics, V. O. Key, Jr.

V. ELECTED OFFICIALS

TABLE L -- Negro Congressmen 1869 - 1961

| Congress | | No. Negro Elected Officials | States Represented |
|---|---|---|---|
| 41st | 1869 - 71 | 3 | S.C., Ga., Miss. |
| 42nd | 1871 - 73 | 5 | Fla. (1); Ala. (1); S.C. (2) |
| 43rd | 1873 - 75 | 7 | S.C. (4); Ala. (1); Fla. (1); Miss. (1) |
| 44th | 1875 - 77 | 8 | Miss. (2); S.C. (2); 1 each - Fla., Ala., N.C., La. |
| 45th | 1877 - 79 | 4 | S.C. (3); Miss. (1) |
| 46th | 1879 - 81 | 2 | Miss., and S.C. |
| 47th | 1881 - 83 | 1 | S.C. |
| 48th | 1883 - 85 | 2 | S.C., and N.C. |
| 49th | 1885 - 87 | 2 | S.C., and N.C. |
| 51st | 1889 - 91 | 3 | S.C., N.C., and Va. |
| 52nd | 1891 - 93 | 1 | N.C. |
| 53rd | 1893 - 95 | 1 | S.C. |
| 54th | 1895 - 97 | 1 | S.C. |
| 56th | 1899 - 1901 | 1 | N.C. |
| 71st through the | 1929 - 31 | | |
| 78th | 1943 - 45 | 1 | Ill. |
| 79th through the | 1945 - 47 | | |
| 83rd | 1953 - 55 | 2 | Ill., and N.Y. |
| 84th | 1955 - 57 | 3 | Ill., N.Y., Mich. |
| 85th | 1957 - 59 | 3 | Ill., N.Y., Mich. |
| 86th | 1959 - 61 | 4 | Ill., N.Y., Mich., Pa. |
| 87th | 1961 - 63 | 4 | Ill., N.Y., Mich., Pa. |

TABLE M -- Negro State Legislature and City Council Members

(Estimate of Average No. Since 1948)*

State Legislatures

| State | No. | State | No. |
|---|---|---|---|
| (Total States (16) | | | |
| Ariz. | 2 | Mo. | 3 |
| Cal. | 2 | N.J. | 1 |
| Col. | 2 | N.Y. | 4 |
| Ill. | 5 | Ohio | 2 |
| Ind. | 2 | Pa. | 6 |
| Kan. | 1 | W. Va. | 1 |
| Mass. | 1 | Wis. | 1 |
| Mich. | 5 | Vmt. | 1 |

City Councils

| City | No. | City | No. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Total Cities (23) | | | |
| Boston, Mass. | 1 | Nashville, Tenn. | 3 |
| Buffalo, N. Y. | 1 | New Haven, Conn. | 1 |
| Canton, Ohio | 1 | New York, New York | 1 |
| Cleveland, Ohio | 3 | Oak Ridge, Tenn. | 1 |
| Chicago, Ill. | 6 | Philadelphia, Pa. | 1 |
| Charleston, W. Va. | 1 | Richmond, Va. | 1 |
| Cincinnati, Ohio | 2 | Springfield, Mass. | 1 |
| Detroit, Michigan | 1 | St. Louis, Mo. | 2 |
| Evanston, Ill. | 1 | Toledo, Ohio | 1 |
| Fayetteville, N. C. | 1 | Winston Salem, N. C. | 2 |
| Gary, Ind. | 1 | | |
| Greensboro, N. C. | 1 | | |
| Louisville, Kentucky | 1 | | |

*Incomplete rough estimate, taken from data in Negro Handbook, 1952 and Negro Yearbook, 1949.

LARRY GOODWYN

Aff. Audit Reid '63 worth some study

LWD WB + JM SOBK

Democratic Coalition
510 Littlefield Bldg.
AUSTIN, TEXAS

New Shapes in Texas Politics

I. The Two-Party Story

Charts 1 through 7, the increasing decline of conservative participation in Democratic primaries.

II. Voting Trends in Negro Precincts

Chart 8, the relative impact of the Negro vote when it is split, and when it is not.

III. Voting Trends, Geographic

Charts 9, 10, 11, the rise to dominance of the big cities; the decline of East Texas; moderate rises elsewhere.

VI. Voting Trends Among Voters With Spanish Surnames

Chart 12, Bexar County.
Chart 13, South Texas.

These 13 charts represent an attempt to summarize the rapid transition from a one-party Texas in 1954 to the two-party structure that emerged full-grown in 1962. Note that the high-tide of conservative participation in Democratic primaries was reached in 1956 (charts 1, 2 and 3), showing Daniel getting more votes than Shivers in conservative areas, and that since then there has been a consistent decline in conservative participation in the Democratic party. This, of course, is traceable to the rise of the GOP precinct organization which began being formed on an effective basis in 1957 when Thad Hutcheson made the first serious GOP bid for state office. Almost immediately (1958), the conservative Democratic decline began (compare Blakley's vote with Shivers on the first four charts). With additional races by Tower in 1960 and 1961 and by Cox in 1962, this siphoning-off process continued at an accelerated pace (compare Connally's vote with Blakley's). For a quick, clear example: see chart one, showing how Daniel's 1956 margin of 15,515 has dwindled to a 5,621 margin for Connally in 1962.

From internal evidence, it is clear that something over 100,000 conservatives who voted for Shivers in 1954 and for Daniel in 1956 did NOT vote for Blakley in 1958. By the time Connally made his bid in 1962, this figure had expanded to over 275,000 (chart 7).

These developments have obviously changed the way the political game is to be played in Texas. With the losses on their right wing, conservative Democrats can prevail in statewide primaries against moderate and liberal candidates only by cutting into Negro, Latin-American or other Democratic precincts. In fact, so important is the vote of racial and ethnic minorities to the weakening conservative Democratic cause, that it is safe to predict a concerted effort will be made to effect a coalition of big business interests with minority voters, rallied behind a candidate who is economically conservative but not overtly a racist. (See charts 8 and 12 with particular emphasis on the 1962 Democratic runoff).

Chart number 5 deserves special mention. It capsules more of these trends than any other single chart. Note that on the basis of population growth, the line showing voting in the 4 biggest cities should be a steady upward curve. But after 1956, there is a decline in Democratic primary voting in 1958 and again in 1962. This reflects growing conservative abandonment of the Democratic party. Note that R. Yarborough got roughly the same number of votes in 1958 as in 1956. The decline came wholly out of the conservative vote. But note that in 1962 -- though suffering from the same decline (actually, because of population growth, the decline was proportionately even bigger than indicated), Connally was able to hold his own by making inroads into normally democratic precincts. What he lost to the GOP, he picked up from the traditional Democratic precincts. Chart 6 shows exactly the same pattern in the 11 next largest cities.

This pattern is only now filtering into rural areas; if the experience of the period covered by these charts holds firm, the two-party system can be expected in the small towns and rural counties in 1964 and be fully consolidated for state races by 1966. It seems merely a question of the GOP precinct organization having the necessary time to complete the job of expansion. It took four years, beginning in 1957 in the four big cities; and four years, effectively beginning in 1959, in the 11 middle-sized cities. By 1964, it seems indicated that 350,000-400,000 conservatives who supported Shivers and Daniel will not participate in the Democratic primary of 1964, with some 400,000-450,000 adandoning the party by 1966. Thus, the conservative Democratic bid for minority votes seems to have only a very short-run value -- for 1962 and 1964 -- after which time, the blood-transfusions to the Republicans will have become too large to enable conservative candidates to win statewide Democratic primaries.

Charts 9, 10 and 11 trace the sharply-define geographic changes in Texas since 1954. Chart 9 shows that East Texas, which out-voted the cities substantially in 1954, is, in turn, now outvoted by the cities by well over 2 to 1. Chart 10 indicates that the population loss in East Texas has not helped conservative candidates. Connally actually got a smaller East Texas vote, percentagewise and on an absolute basis, than Shivers got. Don Yarborough's excellent East Texas showing seems to indicate he was not hurt by his liberal stand on civil rights. Chart 11 shows the slight voting growth in South Texas and West Texas and the huge growth in the 15 biggest counties. Note that the latter now have 55% of the state vote. Chart 12, like chart 8, shows how successful the conservative effort was to cut into normally Democratic precincts. There is an absence of a discernible trend for chart 13 because of the fluctuating character of the vote in 10 of the 28 counties listed. These "boss counties" normally try to pick the winner. Any revealing study of South Texas would have to focus on those counties that have already broken the old boss rule. Such an analysis will be initiated in the near future.

Incidentally, in charts 1 through 4, note that (except in his hometown of Houston) D. Yarborough ran behind R. Yarborough in conservative precincts. This refutes the legend, current in some circles, that D. Yarborough's close race with Connally was based on anti-LBJ conservative votes.

HARRIS COUNTY - 25 CONSERVATIVE PRECINCTS

10 TARRANT COUNTY CONSERVATIVE PRECINCTS

11 BEXAR COUNTY CONSERVATIVE PRECINCTS

26 Dallas County Conservative Precincts - Demo Primaries

4 LARGEST CITIES

11 "MIDDLE-SIZE" CITIES

EL PASO, GALVESTON, JEFFERSON, LUBBOCK, WACO, CORPUS
AMARILLO, AUSTIN, WICHITA FALLS, ECTOR, MIDLAND

HOW THE CONSERVATIVE SHIFT AFFECTS DEMOCRATIC PRIMARIES

1956 GOVERNOR'S RACE
(When consentatives still voted Democratic in the Spring and Republican in November.)

R. YARBOROUGH 691,000 DANIEL 694,000

1962 GOVERNOR'S RACE

D. YARBOROUGH -539,000

152,000

Making his first bid for governor, Don Yarborough ran some 152,000 behind the total Ralph Yarborough received in his third campaign for governor. These losses were sustained primarily among brass-collar Democrats in Central and North Central Texas, and in some Negro and Latin-American precincts.

VOTED FOR CONNALLY +152,000

842,000

Thus, if the one-party system of 1956 still existed, Connally would have defeated Don Yarborough by 300,000 votes (842,000 to 539,000).

BUT

CONNALLY POLLED ONLY -565,000

277,000

Conservative Democrats who voted for Daniel in 1956, but who have since turned Republican and did NOT vote in the Democratic Primary of June, 1962. (See charts 1 through 6)

VOTING TRENDS - NEGRO PRECINCTS - 4 LARGEST CITIES

VOTING TRENDS: GEOGRAPHIC

64 EAST TEXAS COUNTIES

1954
GOV. RACE PRIMARY 1962
GOV. RACE RUNOFF
1962
GENERAL ELECTION
28
SOUTH
TEXAS
COUNTIES
(INCLUDES BEXAR & NUECES)
178,275 (12%)
172,673 (16%)
230,903 (15%)
96
WEST
TEXAS
COUNTIES
248,214 (17%)
175,135 (16%)
277,496 (18%)
15
BIGGEST COUNTIES
470,328 (32%)
510,950 (48%)
848,980 (55%)

28 Bexar County Precincts-Predominately Spanish Speaking

28 SOUTH TEXAS COUNTIES

(INCLUDES BEXAR & NUECES)

Suff. Fm.

S
C
L
C

CRUSADE

FOR THE

TO DOUBLE THE NEGRO VOTE
IN THE SOUTH

SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE

"... to secure these rights to ourselves and our posterity ..."

THE NEGRO VOTER IN THE SOUTH

THE FACTS

(1) Over 5 million Negroes of voting age live in the South.

(2) Only 25% of adult Negroes vote compared with 60% white adults.

(3) Purges of voters lists, "slowdowns" by registrars, opening the registration office only one or two days a month and at hours that are not helpful for working people; and

(4) Open intimidation by some plantation bosses and many local officials, all play a part in discouraging the Negro Citizen from becoming a registered voter.

As a result, "Government by consent of the governed," upon which our nation was founded in 1776, is a goal still to be made a reality in most of the South today.

Most of the present crop of Southern Senators and Congressmen will oppose and fillibuster all legislation designed to protect the voting rights of citizens of this region.

YOU CAN CHANGE THIS SITUATION

Despite these obstacles Negro citizens are struggling daily to double the number of voters and to obtain representation in government.

Even the most die-hard segregationist in public office can be made to respect voting power. Furthermore, we know there are many liberal white citizens in the South who count on the Negro votes to increase enough for liberal voices to be heard in the government.

The whole nation will benefit from an enlarged Negro vote in the South. This area of our country CAN elect men and women of good will and a sense of justice to Congress and to local state legislatures.

Let all who believe in Freedom and Human Dignity join in this great Crusade For The Ballot Now!!

Young people in Macon, Georgia in line at the County Courthouse to become new registered voters. With S. C. L. C. help, Negroes in Macon doubled their voting power in a ninety-day campaign during 1962.

All over the South, people at the grass-roots level are joining the CRUSADE FOR THE BALLOT.

CRUSADE FOR THE BALLOT

TO DOUBLE THE NEGRO VOTE IN THE SOUTH

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.
President, S. C. L. C.

HOW

✓ To educate and stimulate Negroes to exercise the vote.

✓ To help them obtain the right to vote where in practice it does not exist.

ORGANIZE

✓ SCLC will help your community to organize registration schools, workshops for local leaders, public meetings on voter registration and provide material when requested.

IN UNITY THERE IS STRENGTH

✓ No narrow partisan interest must be allowed to divide us. In reaching a cross section of the Negro community, the Crusade will move across party lines.

✓ It is for the good of the local community that all civic, church, fraternal and other organizations cooperate in this effort.

NONVIOLENCE

✓ The Freedom Movement in the Deep South is a non-violent revolution, giving birth to a new day of progress and human dignity for all Americans, for generations to come.

REGISTER AND VOTE

✓ Remember if you are already registered you must vote in elections in order to keep your name listed on the registration books.

All elections are important for gaining needed improvements in the community and speeding the day of full freedom.

"The goal of the Freedom Movement in the South can be summed up in 3 words:
All, Here, and Now

We want all of our rights as citizens (not just some rights);
We want them here, in the Deep South, and We want them now---"

-Martin Luther King, Jr.

When you have finished reading this, please pass it on to a member of the family, a neighbor or a friend.

Additional copies may be secured upon request from one of the addresses listed below:

For further information write the local organization:

OR

SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE
VOTER REGISTRATION DEPARTMENT
332 AUBURN AVENUE, N. E.
ATLANTA, GEORGIA
Telephone 524-1378

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.
President

WYATT TEE WALKER
Executive Director

ATTY. I. M. AUGUSTINE
General Counsel

VOTER REGISTRATION FIELD STAFF

J. H. CALHOUN
Georgia State Director

HERBERT COULTON
Virginia & Carolinas

JAMES BEVEL
Mississippi

FRED BENNETT
Georgia Assistant Director

HARRY BLAKE
Louisiana & E. Texas

BERNARD S. LEE
Student Liaison Organizer

J. H. O'DELL
Regional Consultant

(Miss) ANNELL PONDER
Secretary

CITIZENSHIP SCHOOL PROGRAM

(Mrs.) DOROTHY F. COTTON
Director of Education

ANDREW J. YOUNG Administrator

(Mrs.) SEPTIMA P. CLARK
Supervisor, Teacher Training

SOUTHERN

CHRISTIAN

LEADERSHIP

CONFERENCE

Suffrage, South

Martin Luther King, Jr., President
Wyatt Tee Walker, Director

Teacher Training Class in Session

Citizenship Education Program

The Purpose Of The Citizenship School

The Citizenship Schools are for adults. Their immediate program is teaching reading and writing. They help students to pass literacy tests for voting. But they also give an all-around education in community development which includes housing, recreation, health, and improved home life. Specific subjects include filing income tax forms, understanding of tax-supported resources such as water testing for wells, aid to handicapped children, public health facilities, how government is run, social security, etc.

The Citizenship Schools give people help that is not available through any other private or public program at the present time.

They are open to all people of a community who face problems related to first class citizenship and want to do something about them.

☆ ☆ ☆

Citizenship Schools & Voter Registration

Persons not registered to vote fall into three classes (1) Those too lazy, (2) Those who need brief instruction in a registration clinic, and (3) Those who need general instruction and encouragement.

The Citizenship School is specifically designed to work with group 3. No voter registration plan is complete without a program for those who need help in the fundamentals of citizenship.

How Do We Prepare For First-Class Citizenship ? ?

Each church and community organization should have a CITIZENSHIP SCHOOL to train its members to be good citizens.

Civic and social organizations may sponsor schools for those who have not had a chance to take this training.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference will train persons from your church or civic organization to become teachers for your community. These teachers will help to prepare everyone in your community to be a first class citizen.

SCLC will provide:

—the cost of travel to Training Center
—tuition
—training
—supervision and materials

You will provide:

—a place for schools to meet (church, community bldg., etc.)
—a community coordinator for schools in your area
—qualified persons to be trained as teachers
—continued support of the local schools

Please submit applications to:

Mrs. Dorothy F. Cotton
SCLC Citizenship Education Program
41 Exchange Place, S.E.
Atlanta 3, Georgia
Phone 524-1370

"Our Training Center"

Whom Do You Send For Training?

Persons who are respected by members of their community and are acceptable to them as teachers.

Persons who are willing to give time in organizing classes, getting pupils, and making other practical arrangements.

Persons who are willing to give two nights a week for 12 weeks to teach a class in basic citizenship.

Persons who are at least 21 years old; though younger persons may be trained if they have the time and the interest.

Persons with practical skills who could be taught to teach (beauticians, tradesmen, farmers, seamstresses, etc.).

Retired school teachers, railroad and postal workers, self employed persons, etc.

Experienced Sunday School teachers.

Persons who read well aloud and who write legibly on a blackboard.

APPLICATION FOR TEACHER TRAINING

Citizenship Education Program of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference
41 Exchange Place, S.E., Atlanta, Georgia

Name_____ Date_____

Address_____ Married_____ Single_____

_____ Telephone_____

Occupation_____ Registered Voter: Yes ☐ No ☐

Other Jobs Held_____

Volunteer Leadership Experience_____

Sponsoring Organization_____

By_____ Title_____

What Makes A First Class Citizen?

Ability to read and write.

Understanding of the responsibilities of voting, taking part in community affairs.

Elementary knowledge of local, state, and federal government.

Knowledge of the rights and privileges of the individual before the law.

Understanding of politics and how it works.

Knowledge of the Constitution of the United States and how it works.

All over the country there are adults who are not registered to vote, and who generally do not participate in their civic affairs. These persons are not full citizens. Many of them have not had an opportunity to learn what is required of first class citizens. These people need Citizenship training.

M. L. King Jr.

WBV
SB
Suff. VA.

66% OF ADULT VIRGINIANS DID NOT VOTE IN 1960

. . . . . WHY?

Among the factors limiting the size of the electorate the Poll Tax ranks high.

The poll tax deadline, 6 months before an election, is confusing and restrictive.

An accumulated 3 years tax ($4.99 a person) is a financial burden for many families.

DO YOU WANT A PRICE TAG ON YOUR VOTE?

Unless Virginia's Constitution is changed to eliminate the poll tax as a qualification for voting IN ANY ELECTION, voters may be required to register every two years for federal elections, and in addition pay the poll tax 6 months before state and local elections.

This would be even more costly, confusing and restrictive than the present system.

WE URGE TOTAL REPEAL OF THE POLL TAX

AS A QUALIFICATION FOR VOTING

and propose a simple, uniform registration system as follows . . . (over)

We suggest

A PERMANENT PERSONAL REGISTRATION SYSTEM

SIMPLE — ECONOMICAL — SAFE

HOW WOULD IT WORK?

1. A new voter would register in person, at a designated center.
2. Every registered voter would remain on the list as long as he lived at the same address and voted regularly (at least once every 4 years.)
3. Every voter would sign his name at the polls before getting his ballot. Comparison with his registration signature would identify him instantly. The signature would be his affidavit of continued eligibility and assure his being kept on the list.
4. Every person who failed to vote for 4 years would be notified by letter that he would be removed from the list unless he replied within 30 days claiming continued eligibility.
5. Health officers would be required to report to the registration officer the death of anyone over 21.
6. Registration would be conducted throughout the year, except for 30 days before an election.

SUCH A SYSTEM, USED IN MANY OTHER STATES, MEETS ACCEPTED STANDARDS FOR SOUND REGISTRATION PRACTICE.

IT WOULD
- Be convenient for the voter.
- Keep the lists correct and up to date.
- Provide for positive voter identification.
- Be simple and economical to administer.

DOUBLE REGISTRATION SYSTEMS for federal and for state and local elections would be costly to the taxpayer, cumbersome for registration officials, and confusing and uncertain for every citizen.

WORK FOR TOTAL REPEAL OF THE POLL TAX

Make your views known to Governor Harrison and to your representatives in the General Assembly

LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF VIRGINIA

Mrs. John W. McDonald, President
524 S. Payne St., Fairfax, Va.

Distributed by:

LWD, WB, JS
Supreme Court

Klimecke, who fatally shot a man who, after committing a felony, refused to obey the command to halt. The editorial comments on a telegram signed by Julius W. Hobson, president of the Committee on Racial Equality, and sent to the press.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CASE OF CORE AND OFFICER KLIMECKE

We have a few comments to make on the following telegram, signed "Julius W. Hobson, president" which the District of Columbia Commissioners received from CORE (Committee on Racial Equality), with copies sent to the newspapers by CORE.

"Murder of James Wall by untrained rookie policeman establishes need for immediate action to protect citizens of 10th precinct from police brutality. Officer Giles mentioned too frequently recently in connection with brutality and trigger-happy rookies should not be given guns before completing training. CORE demands new captain, lieutenants, and sergeants in 10th precinct, thorough investigation of brutality charges against policemen, and training program on relations with public. CORE suggests that both investigation and training program be conducted by persons not connected with police department. Also suggest thorough tests of emotional stability for recruits and periodically for all police."

Only one James Wall has been shot here. Only one policeman shot him. His name is Officer Frank Klimecke. (There was no "Officer Giles" involved.)

It seems to us that CORE and its officials are, quite likely, open for a suit of criminal libel. Officer Klimecke was doing his duty. CORE publicly calls it murder.

Policemen, it seems to us, should have the same protection from reckless and unproved charges as has the ordinary citizen, and have the same recourse to the courts when libeled.

The facts on record show Officer Klimecke fatally shot a man who, after committing a felony, refused to obey the command to halt. Colored witnesses support the policeman.

CORE goes on to refer to "trigger-happy rookies." Insofar as this might be supposed to refer to Officer Klimecke, we checked and learned that he served in France with the Army's military police for 3 years.

Nobody hates trigger-happy policemen more than we do. We hate them as much as we hate trigger-happy stickup men, or muggers who throttle peaceful citizens, or gangs (no matter how young they are) that beat people to death, or cowardly lifelong criminals—such as the one Officer Klimecke nailed—who ruthlessly attack defenseless women on the city's streets.

We hate them whether they are white or Negro, or whether their victims are white or Negro.

We'd like to think CORE shares our feelings, but we don't know.

We do know we don't share CORE's feelings about Officer Klimecke. Rather than denouncing him as a murderer, we think he deserves—if not a medal—at least a citation for doing his duty.

Neither do we share CORE's suggestion that the training of policemen should be done by persons not connected with the Police Department. That's about as silly a notion as we've heard in sometime.

CORE suggests there should be tests of emotional stability for recruits and, periodically, for all police. This is a good idea, but we thought we'd already heard of it somewhere. So we checked with the Police Department. CORE might be interested to know that this is already being done, and has been for years, by a trained psychiatrist.

Perhaps some of CORE's officials could profitably take similar tests for emotional stability, or lack of.

Racially oriented champions of less rigorous police safeguards for Washington overlook the fact that the respectable, law-abiding colored citizens are endangered as much or more than white citizens by a tiny tribe of almost hopelessly uncivilized brutes who can best be described as urban Mau Maus. This minuscule fraction of the city's population circulates in and out of our courts and jails, and causes nearly all the violent crime.

The great body of colored Washingtonians is, as is demonstrated every day, made up of upright, decent and law-abiding citizens. They suffer, along with the rest of us, from the depredations of this small group of habitually lawless primitives which can only be controlled by force.

The statistics to back these facts up are well known and easily proved. Rather than face them, CORE suggests another cat-hauling of the Police Department.

In the present instance, which has so exercised CORE, the criminal, shot down while fleeing after committing an outrageous robbery, turned out to have a record as long as your arm.

We suggest that rather than another investigation of the Police Department, the incident indicates there should be an investigation of the parole system which returns career predators, with jail terms still uncompleted, to the city's streets where they resume preying on defenseless citizens.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY NEXT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in adjournment until Tuesday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

QUALIFICATIONS OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, twice before—in 1956 and 1957—I submitted resolutions which would have required that at least one of each two successive nominations confirmed by the Senate for Associate Justice of the Supreme Court should have had at least 10 years of prior judicial service for confirmation. I am resubmitting the same resolution at this time, being all the more persuaded that the adoption of and adherence to such a resolution would be in the interest of a better judiciary at the highest level, and consequently the best interests of the Nation.

I ask unanimous consent that, out of order, I may submit the resolution for myself and for the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], and that it may be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 114) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That from and after the date of adoption of this resolution, at least one of each two successive nominees confirmed by the Senate for the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court shall, at the time of the confirmation, have had at least ten years of judicial service. For the purpose of this paragraph, "judicial service" means service as a justice of the United States (as defined in section 451 of title 28, United States Code), a judge of a court of appeals or district court, or a justice or judge of the highest court of a State or of any other State court having general jurisdiction.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, of the Justices now sitting on the Court, three Associate Justices have been regularly appointed since, on February 18, 1957, I last submitted the resolution, and at that time another, Mr. Justice Brennan, was sitting under a recess appointment. The three Justices in question are Mr. Justice Stewart, who received an interim appointment on October 14, 1958, and a permanent appointment on May 7, 1959; Mr. Justice White, who was appointed on April 12, 1962; and Mr. Justice Goldberg, who was appointed on September 28, 1962. Five years is the total of prior judicial experience for Mr. Justice Stewart, Mr. Justice Goldberg, and Mr. Justice White; and all of it is concentrated in Mr. Justice Stewart, who sat on the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit from June 1, 1954 to May 15, 1959. Apart from Mr. Justice Black's service on a minor rung of the judicial ladder—police court in Birmingham, Ala., 1910–11—the total prior judicial experience of the nine justices now sitting is only 14 years, consisting of 8 years for Mr. Justice Brennan, 5 years for Mr. Justice Stewart, and 1 year for Mr. Justice Harlan. As I have stated, Mr. Justice Brennan was sitting on the Court when I last submitted the resolution, and after that was permanently appointed on March 21, 1957.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. The junior Senator from Wyoming joined with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] on a bill, S. 222, which states that "no person shall be appointed to the office of Chief Justice of the United States or to the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court unless, at the time of his appointment, he has had at least 5 years of judicial service."

The resolution of the Senator from Virginia would require that at least one of each two successive nominees have judicial experience. Does not the Senator feel that the Supreme Court would be materially strengthened if all the Justices had at least 5 or 10 years of judicial experience?

Mr. STENNIS. I certainly agree with the Senator from Wyoming and think it would strengthen the Court and would serve the very purpose the Senator from Mississippi here has in mind. The resolution of the Senator from Mississippi takes a different approach to the matter of trying to bring more prior judicial experience to the personnel of the Court.

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me say that the Senator from Wyoming agrees wholeheartedly with the approach of the Senator from Mississippi. I was just wondering about the reason for leaving out the requirement that one out of the two successive nominees have such experience.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for his support and his inquiry. The question has been raised as to whether or not a statute requiring prior judicial practice would be valid under the Constitution. A serious constitutional question has been raised on that point. Also, if there were a requirement of judicial experience for all the nominees, a considerable part of the talent of the Nation in that profession would be excluded.

Now, as a start, as a beginning point, and also as a simple way of getting at the problem by a Senate resolution, the Senator from Mississippi has proposed that we just announce in advance, under the advise and consent clause of the Constitution, that in passing on these nominations at least one out of two will have to have had 10 years of judicial experience; otherwise, the nominations just will not be confirmed. It will not refer to any individual. The Senate, under its constitutional responsibility of advice and consent, will merely be announcing a rule in advance.

The Senator from Mississippi thinks that would be a salutary start toward a reform that is overdue and also be another assertion by the Senate, for the legislative branch of the Government, not only of its power but of its responsibility of looking into this matter in advance.

I thank the Senator very much for his fine support. I hope he pursues his bill further.

Resuming with my prepared remarks, I deem it necessary that some qualifications of judicial experience should be a requisite for at least one-half of the nominees for this post and because in recent years such experience has not been considered of prime importance by those persons who advise the President on his selection of nominees. In respect of what I consider to be the prime ingredient for service on the Supreme Court, namely, experience on the bench, I believe that this highest of tribunals has been sadly neglected in the past 30 years or so and that the Nation has greatly been the loser thereby. In our tripartite system of Government, with each branch complementing the other, distinctions perhaps should not be drawn as the comparative importance of its various branches. Yet the Supreme Court authority is so vast and far rearching with its power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional that it may be said in a sense that it is the most important segment of Government; in so many cases, it is the final arbiter, the last word. Yet, it is this branch of Government which has a total of only 14 years' prior judicial experience, all of it distributed among only three Justices although all nine sit on cases of vital consequence to the 188 million people of this country.

Mr. President, this expression of opinion on my part constitutes no attack on any particular Justice.

I am bringing to the attention of the Congress and to the attention of the country a serious defect in the functioning of our system of government.

It is interesting to compare the previous judicial experience of the present members of the Court, at the time of their appointment, with that of judges appointed through the years. Since John Jay was appointed as the first Chief Justice in 1790, there have been 98 judges appointed to the Court, including 14 Chief Justices.

From 1790 until 1900, 58 judges were appointed, and only 19 of them had no prior judicial experience. In the years from 1900 to 1932, 20 judges were appointed, with the majority—11 of them—with previous judicial experience. But in recent years, from 1932 until the present time, those appointed without prior judicial experience have outnumbered those with such experience 12 to 8. Unfortunately, we now have only 3 judges on the Court who possessed prior judicial experience at the time of their appointment. This is not a healthy trend.

At my request, the American Law Section of the Library of Congress has compiled a list of all the Chief Justices and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, including a reference to the prior judicial experience of those who possess such experience, and I think the Senate will be interested in this list. I request unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHIEF JUSTICES, SUPREME COURT SERVICE, AND PRIOR JUDICIAL SERVICE

John Jay, 1790–96, chief justice, New York, Supreme Court, 1776–79.

John Rutledge, 1795–95 (4 mos.), chief justice, Supreme Court, South Carolina, 1791–95.

Oliver Ellsworth, 1796–1800, judge, Governor's Council, Connecticut (Supreme Court of Errors), Colonial, 1780–85, judge, Supreme Court, Connecticut, 1785–89.

John Marshall, 1801–35, none found.

Roger Brooke Taney, 1836–64, none found.

Salmon Portland Chase, 1864–73, none found.

Morrison Remick Waite, 1874–88, none found.

Melville Weston Fuller, 1888–1910, none found.

Edward Douglas White, 1910–21, justice, Louisiana Supreme Court, 1879–80.

William Howard Taft, 1921–30, judge, Supreme Court, Ohio, 1887–93, judge, Federal Circuit Court, Sixth Circuit, 1892–1900.

Charles Evans Hughes, 1930–41, none found.

Harlan Fiske Stone, 1941–46, none found.

Frederick Moore Vinson, 1946–53, Associate Justice, U.S. Court of Appeals, 1938–43, D.C.

Earl Warren, 1953 to present, none found.

ASSOCIATE COURT SERVICE, AND PRIOR JUDICIAL SERVICE

John Rutledge, 1790–91, chief justice, Supreme Court, South Carolina, 1791–95.

William Cushing, 1790–1810, probation judge, Lincoln County, Maine (Colonial) 1760–72, judge, Superior Court, Massachusetts (Colonial) 1772–75, judge, Supreme Judicial Court, Massachusetts, 1775–77, chief justice, Supreme Judicial Court, Massachusetts, 1777–89.

James Wilson, 1789–98, none found.

John Blair, 1789–96, general court, Virginia (Colonial) 1778–86; judge, high court of chancery, Va. (Colonial) 1780; judge, Virginia First Court of Appeals, 1780–1789.

James Iredell, 1790–99, superior court judge, North Carolina (Colonial) 1777–78.

Thomas Johnson, 1792–93, chief judge, general court, Maryland. (Colonial) 1790–91.

William Paterson, 1793–1806, none found.

Samuel Chase, 1796–1811, chief judge, criminal court, Baltimore, Md. (Colonial) 1788; chief judge, general court, Maryland, 1791.

Bushrod Washington, 1799–1829, none found.

Alfred Moore, 1800–04, judge, superior court, North Carolina, 1798–99.

William Johnson, 1804–34, judge, court of common pleas, 1798–1804.

Henry Brockholst Livingston, 1807–23, judge, Supreme Court of New York, 1802–06.

Thomas Todd, 1807–26, judge, Court of Appeals, Kentucky, 1801–06; chief justice, Court of Appeals, Kentucky, 1806–07.

Gabriel Duvall, 1811–35, none found.

Joseph Story, 1811–45, none found.

Smith Thompson, 1823–43, associate justice, Supreme Court, New York, 1802–14; chief justice, Supreme Court, New York, 1814–19.

Robert Trimble, 1826–28, judge, Court of Appeals, Kentucky, 1807–09; Federal district judgeship, Kentucky, 1817–26.

John McLean, 1830–61, judge, Supreme Court, Ohio, 1861–22.

Henry Baldwin, 1830–44, none found.

James Moore Wayne, 1835–67, judge, Superior Court, Georgia, 1824–29.

Philip Pendleton Barbour, 1836–41, judge, general court, Virginia, 1825–27; judge, U.S. District Court, Eastern, Virginia, 1830–36.

John Catron, 1837–65, judge, Supreme Court of Errors and Appeals (then court of last resort), Tennessee, 1824–31.

John McKinely, 1837–52, none found.

Peter Vivian Daniel, 1842–60, judge, U.S. district court, Virginia, 1836–41.

Samuel Nelson, 1845–72, judge, 6th circuit, New York, 1823–31; associate justice, Supreme Court, New York, 1831–45.

Levi Woodbury, 1845–51, judge, New Hampshire Superior Court, 1817–23 (6 years).

Robert Cooper Grier, 1846–70, presiding judge, district court, Allegheny County, Pa., 1833–46.

Benjamin Robbins Curtis, 1851–57, none found.

John Archibald Campbell, 1853–61, none found.

Nathan Clifford, 1858–81, none found.

Noah Haynes Swayne, 1862–81, none found.

Samuel Freeman Miller, 1862–90, justice of the peace, Barbourville, Ky., (date?).

David Davis, 1862–77, judge, 8th judicial district, Illinois, 1848–62.

Stephen Johnson Field, 1863–97, justice, Supreme Court, California, 1857–63.

William Strong, 1870–80, judge, Supreme Court, Pennsylvania, 1857–68.

Joseph P. Bradley, 1870–92, none found.

Ward Hunt, 1873–82, New York Court of Appeals, 1865–73.

John Marshall Harlan, 1877–1911, judge, county court, Franklin County, Ky., 1858–59.

William Burnham Woods, 1880–87, judge, U.S. Circuit Court, Fifth Circuit, 1869–80.

Stanley Matthews, 1881–89, judge, court of common pleas, Hamilton County, Ohio, 1851, judge, superior court, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1863–65.

Horace Gray, 1881–1902, justice, Supreme Judicial Court, Massachusetts, 1864–81.

Samuel Blatchford, 1882–93, district judge, New York, second district, 1867–73; circuit judge, second judicial district, 1873–82.

Lucius Quintas C. Lamar, 1888–93, none found.

David Josiah Brewer, 1889–1910, commissioner, Federal circuit court, district of Kansas, 1861–62; judge, probation and criminal courts, Leavenworth County, Kans., 1862–65; judge, first judicial district of Kansas, 1865–69; Supreme Court of Kansas, 1870–84; Federal circuit court, eighth district, 1884–89.

Henry Billings Brown, 1891–1906, circuit judge, Wayne County, Mich., 1868–(?); U.S. judge, eastern district, Michigan, 1875–90.

George Shiras, Jr., 1892–1903, none found.

Howard Edmunds Jackson, 1893–95, circuit court, sixth circuit, 1886–91; presiding judge, circuit court, appeals, 6th circuit, 1891–93.

Edward Douglas White, 1894–1910, justice, Louisiana Supreme Court, 1879–80.

Rufus Wheeler Peckham, 1896–1909, justice, Supreme Court, New York, 1883–86; Court of Appeals, New York, 1886–96.

Joseph McKenna, 1898–1925, judge, Circuit Court, Ninth Circuit, 1892–97.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, 1902–32, associate judge, superior judicial court, Massachusetts, 1883–1889; chief justice, superior judicial court, Massachusetts, 1889–1902.

Rufus William Ray, 1903–22, judge, court of common pleas, 1886–89; U.S. Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1899–1903.

William Henry Moody, 1906–10, none found.

Horace Harmon Lurton, 1910–14, justice, Supreme Court, Tennessee, 1886–93; U.S. Circuit Court appeals judge, Sixth Circuit, 1893–1909.

Charles Evans Hughes, 1910–16, none found.

Willis Van Devanter, 1910–37, chief justice, Supreme Court, Wyoming, 1889–90; U.S. Circuit judge, Eighth Circuit, 1903–10.

Joseph Rucker Lamar, 1911–16, associate justice, Supreme Court, Georgia, 1906–08.

Mahlon Pitney, 1912–22, associate justice, New Jersey Supreme Court, 1901–08.

James Clark McReynolds, 1914–41, none found.

Louis Dembitz Brandeis, 1916–39, none found.

John Hessin Clarke, 1916–22, U.S. District judge, North District of Ohio, 1914–16.

George Sutherland, 1922–38, none found.

Pierce Butler, 1923–39, none found.

Edward Terry Sanford, 1923–30, judge, U.S. District Court, Middle and Eastern District, Tennessee, 1908–23.

Harlan Fiske Stone, 1925–41, none found.

Owen Josephus Roberts, 1930–45, none found.

Benjamin Nathan Cardozo, 1932–38, judge, Supreme Court, New York, 1914; associate judge, Court of Appeals, New York, 1914–32.

Hugo Lafayette Black, 1937 to present, police judge, Birmingham, Ala., 1910–11.

Stanley Forman Reed, 1938–57, none found.

Felix Frankfurter, 1939–62, none found.

William Orville Douglas, 1939 to present, none found.

Frank Murphy, 1940–49, judge, recorders court, Detroit, Mich., 1923–30.

James Francis Byrnes, 1941–42, none found.

Robert Houghwout Jackson, 1941–54, none found.

Wiley Blount Rutledge, 1943–49, U.S. Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, 1939–43.

Harold Hitz Burton, 1945–58, none found.

Thomas Campbell Clark, 1949 to present, none found.

Sherman Minton, 1949–56, Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 1941–49.

John Marshall Harlan, 1955 to present, U.S. Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1954–55.

William J. Brennan, Jr., 1956 to present, superior court judge, New Jersey, 1949–50; appellate division judge, 1950–52; justice, Supreme Court, New Jersey, 1952–56.

Charles E. Whittaker, 1957–62, U.S. District Court, Western District of Missouri, 1954–56; Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 1956–57.

Potter Stewart, 1959 to present, Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1954–58.

Byron R. White, 1962 to present, none found.

Arthur J. Goldberg, 1962 to present, none found.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I am fully cognizant, of course, that there are a number of examples of fine and outstanding Justices of the Supreme Court who enjoyed no prior judicial experience. Among these were Chief Justice Marshall, Chief Justice Hughes, and Mr. Justice Brandeis, and there are others.

This resolution, of course, gives a President latitude for the appointment of such men so there can be no dispute on that aspect of the case, but there are powerfully persuasive reasons, policy reasons and others, which commend the principle that there is no substitute for judicial experience in the other high callings.

John Locke said in his Essay Concerning Human Understanding:

> No man's knowledge here can go beyond his experience.

And Patrick Henry, speaking in the Virginia House of Delegates on March 23, 1775, said:

> I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience.

Mr. President, a seasoned Justice is not created overnight. Judicial maturity is attained only after long years of painstaking study, research and analysis. This experience should be gained under conditions where his aberrations and his deviations from the law will be brought forcefully home in reversals by higher courts. He will be ready for Olympus only after he has felt the bolts from the high places. He should not be placed in a position where his errors will be perpetuated on the books for years to come. A judicial approach is the result of years of development; it is the essence of self-restraint.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I warmly commend my distinguished colleague from Mississippi upon his able discussion of a most vital issue.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I heard him say, and I want to repeat it in order to emphasize it, that—

> This experience—

Referring to previous experience as a judge—> should be gained under conditions where his aberrations and his deviations from the law will be brought forcefully home in reversals by higher courts.

Do we not often speak of a man having a judicial temperament?

Mr. STENNIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTSON. A judicial temperament, as I construe it, is a temperament by which a judge, when he hears the evidence, will evaluate it calmly and dispassionately, and when he seeks to apply that evidence, he will apply it to the law as it is written, and not as it would be if he had written the law. Is not that judicial temperament?

Mr. STENNIS. That is a very excellent definition of it. It has been illustrated that such a temperament can be gained only by experience.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That is correct. The Senator from Mississippi graduated in law from Thomas Jefferson's university, and made Phi Beta Kappa there. I graduated in law from what is now Richmond University, and made Phi Beta Kappa. But I think he will agree that neither he nor I were lawyers until we had had experience. We knew the theory of the law and the holdings in a few cases like Marbury against Madison, and the rule in Shelley's case, and things like that, but we had to get out under the spreading chestnut tree and before a justice of the peace, and then before a jury, before we were lawyers.

Mr. STENNIS. That is where real legal knowledge starts.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Therefore, last year I was happy to join in the resolution of my colleague providing that one out of two successive nominees to the Supreme Court should have 10 years experience. There is only a total of 14 years prior judicial experience among the members of the Supreme Court at the present time.

Mr. STENNIS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have seen some appropriate statistics, speaking of the self-restraint that occurs out of respect for the law as it was written, and not as that person would have written it if he had had his free way.

Ever since President Roosevelt had Senator Ashurst introduce in this body in 1937 a bill to pack the Supreme Court on the ground that it was composed of what one might call reactionary fossils who could not interpret the Constitution in terms of 20th century conditions, the Supreme Court has overruled previous decisions of the Court 36 times, whereas previous to that time the Court in all the history of our Nation, from 1789 down to 1935, had made such overrulings only 26 times.

Mr. STENNIS. Those are striking figures. I am glad the Senator brought them out, with that dividing line, because the Senator from Mississippi had a dividing line at 1932, which is another basis, but it was in 1937 when these overrulings and reversals really started picking up, for the reasons that the Senator has given.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The reason the Senator from Virginia has paid so much attention to the dividing line of 1937 is that he has always contended that the general welfare clause was a limitation upon the powers specifically delegated; that these powers must be exercised, as Jefferson and Madison had held, for the general welfare, and that they cannot hold out a sugar plum to some little town or some selected groups.

When President Roosevelt got on the neck of the Court about the NRA decisions, and about the decision that he could not put a processing tax on wheat and distribute it to the farmers because they were in violation of the 10th amendment, along comes the Supreme Court in Helvering against Davis, in 1937, and nullified the 10th amendment so far as any limitation on spending is concerned. They said in substance, "The general welfare clause gives us the power to spend for anything we please."

We used to go through the formality of putting a preamble on a bill, providing, "Whereas, the general welfare will be promoted," and so forth, and then the resolving clause. We do not bother with that any more. We just spend for anything we please. That is the reason the Senator from Virginia has paid so much attention to the fact that the Supreme Court as now constituted has no regard whatever for what those who wrote the Constitution said it meant, and has no regard for all of the great justices, from John Marshall on down, and for the 10th amendment, as being a part of the Constitution.

I warmly commend the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for his contribution. The Senator from Virginia is one of the great constitutional lawyers of his generation and is an able and experienced Senator.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON. Would not the Senator from Mississippi agree that the appointments to the Supreme Court over the past 30 years, at least, were based more on the principle of repayment of political obligations than upon any judicial experience of the appointees?

Mr. STENNIS. That has certainly been the case as to many of them, most unfortunately. It is partly the Senate's fault, I think, because it had not vigorously maintained its prerogatives and its clear responsibilities.

Mr. SIMPSON. I cannot agree with the Senator more.

Mr. STENNIS. Historically, until the last 30 years or so, the most effective check on the Supreme Court has been its own self-restraint. In the rumbles of dissenting justices since that time may be perceived, their understanding within the court that the bounds of self-restraint have been violated time after time.

Mr. President, in that connection and on that subject, I quote from the Conference of the Chief Justices of the State Supreme Courts, at the convention held on August 23, 1958, at which convention they passed by a vote of 36 to 8 the following report, paragraph 5 of which I shall read, with emphasis:

5. That this conference hereby respectfully urges that the Supreme Court of the United States, in exercising the great powers confided to it for the determination of questions as to the allocation and extent of National and State powers, respectively, and as to the validity under the Federal Constitution of the exercise of powers reserved to the States, exercise one of the greatest of all judicial powers—the power of judicial self-restraint—by recognizing and giving effect to the difference between that which, on the one hand, the Constitution may prescribe or permit, and that which, on the other, a majority of the Supreme Court, as from time to time constituted, may deem desirable or undesirable, to the end that our system of Federalism may continue to function with and through the preservation of local self-government.

That paragraph 5 is a notable landmark. It was adopted almost unanimously by the Conference of Chief Justices of the State Supreme Courts, at a critical time in our history. I believe that this resolution has done a great deal of good. However, alone it is not enough, persuasive as it is. What we need here, in this form, to pass on a very practical part of these selections, is a new start, a new approach, and a new formula, whereby these men are chosen.

I emphasize that I am not attacking any one of these Justices. I am not attacking the judicial branch of the Government, which I believe is the most important branch, and which can and will finally be restored.

Mr. President, may we have order? Conditions are almost intolerable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order. Senators will take their seats.

Mr. STENNIS. A new start is necessary. What I propose is a constitutional way and a logical way to make that start. If we do not take some action in this direction, I believe it will come from some other source, and in the years to come could come in a violent form.

Located as it is at the very apex of Government with its vast power to strike down State and congressional laws and any and all parts of State constitutions requires that men selected to fill its numbers be the best qualified in the United States. Certainly the best qualification is experience in the same type of work, experience enabling the Justice to distill and refine the conflicting positions presented, experience that insulates against deep-set philosophy springing from representation of special groups, experience that provides the buffer between political affiliation and juridical determination.

What then are the constitutional provisions with respect to the Senate in respect to the process of appointment?

The Constitution provides in article II, section 2, that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law or in the heads of departments."

In the earliest days of our history, George Washington solicited advice on his appointments and considered recommendations at great length before making his nominations to fill positions. With the growth of the two-party system in our country, however, the Senate's advice to the Executive in regard to nominations has been a totally neglected constitutional obligation. The function is now performed apparently by the Department of Justice or the Attorney General of the United States, himself an appointee of the President. It is indeed curious that this constitutional duty of the Senate should have, through neglect, crossed the line of the separation of powers and devolved to the Department of Justice—or the Attorney General—the chief litigant in our Federal courts. Add to this the power in the Attorney General to recommend appointment of sitting judges to higher courts and the enormity of our withdrawal from our duty becomes all the more apparent.

The phrase "advice and consent" is not a new or novel concept, nor was it original at the time it was written into the Constitution. While its origin may be obscure, former Senator Pepper, of Pennsylvania, in his oral argument before the Supreme Court in Myers v. U.S. (272 U.S. 52, 1926) traced this important phrase back to 758 A.D. when he said:

The story, in English constitutional history, of the phrase "advice and consent" is coincident with the whole story of the rise and development of English parliamentary government. I find the phrase first used back in the eighth century, 759, when a Northumbrian king does such and such things with the "advice and consent" of his wise men. It comes down through Magna Carta. It comes down through all the ages. And when in 1787 it became necessary, as between those who were championing a strong executive and those who were championing the legislature, to find a middle ground, it was provided, in the language of old English law, that such-and-such things should be done by the President "with the advice and consent" of the Senate.

In America, I find that it was used in the second charter of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, in 1691.

Records of the Constitutional Convention indicate that when the question of the appointive power was considered, an impressive group of delegates, including Benjamin Franklin, of Pennsylvania, urged that the Senate should have this sole responsibility. Alexander Hamilton, the great Federalist, although insisting upon executive nominative power, suggested that the Senate should have the power of rejecting or approving a nomination made by the President.

It was, however, Delegate Gorham, of Massachusetts, who, after pointing out that this method had been in use in his Commonwealth for 140 years, was successful in having "advice and consent" inserted in our Constitution, as it remains today.

"Consent" may well have been the power which Hamilton sought to have conferred on the Senate. It implies and means a concurrence of will or agreement. Hearings preceding confirmation usually determine whether consent to the appointment will be given or withheld.

However, no action is normally taken by the Senate to advise the Executive prior to the nomination of a particular person to fill a vacancy in a constitutional office.

After a nominee has been selected and his name is sent to the Senate with the prestige and power of the President of the United States committed to him, and with the power of the party to which the President belongs usually committed to him, unless there is some flaw in the character of the nominee, his nomination, as a practical proposition, is not rejected. The question no longer is, does the nominee have the basic qualifications of a judicial mind? Or does he have the proper background of experience as a judge? Those questions have fallen by the wayside by the time the nomination has reached the floor of the Senate. The primary consideration then deals with other points.

We know that as a practical matter many times, unfortunately, promises seem to be made far in advance, based upon other contingencies; and the happening of intervening events then decides when the actual nomination shall be made.

A system has been developed which is far removed from the Constitution. A system has been adopted which is dangerous to follow. My resolution, simple as it is, would bring us back on the right track.

This I suggest can and should be done by action of the Senate, and I am today submitting a resolution to set forth and prescribe the minimum qualifications which the Senate would apply in confirming future appointments.

Mr. President, for emphasis, I point out that this device in no way interferes with the discretion of the President in making his selection but is, in essence, a restraint upon the future discretion of the Senate in its unique function of conformation.

Other qualifications may occur to Senators and, while more restrictive criteria than mere professional experience may be the subject of debate on their merits, I feel that by the use of the Senate resolution our constitutional duty to provide a lawful and helpful guide to the President, regardless of who he may be, is one method of returning to the spirit and letter of our Constitution. My resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That from and after the date of adoption of this resolution, at least one of each two successive nominees confirmed by the Senate for the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court shall, at the time of the confirmation, have had at least ten years of judicial service. For the purpose of this paragraph, "judicial service" means service as a justice of the United States (as defined in sec. 451 of title 28, U.S.C.), a judge of a court of appeals or district court, or a justice or judge of the highest court of a State or of any other State court having general jurisdiction.

Mr. President, had this standard of selection obtained for the last 25 years, I doubt that we would have heard of paramount rights which produced, instanter, a new Constitution law doctrine in the submerged and tidal land cases; I doubt that we would have seen the finger of scorn pointed judicially at judicial precedent and contemporaneous legislative construction in order to open a new area of Federal power in locally maintained public schools throughout the country. I doubt whether many other changes which have suddenly been made because the Court changed its mind would have occurred.

The results of the present selection of Judges are well known. A constitutional revolution has taken place in the last 30 years or so as is illustrated by the number of cases in which the Supreme Court had overruled prior decisions of the same Court. From 1789 until 1932, 27 such cases had been overruled. Since 1932, through 1962, 39 such cases have been overruled. These are all cases in which the Supreme Court expressly overruled its prior decision.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the list of those cases be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(1) Hudson v. Guestier (1810) 6 Cr. 281, 285; (2) The Genessee Chief (1815) 12 How. 433, 456; (3) Gazzam v. Phillip's Lessee (1858) 20 How. 372, 377–378; (4) Mason v. Eldred (1868) 6 Wall. 231, 238; (5) Hornbuckle v. Toombs (1874) 18 Wall. 648, 652–653; (6) Railway Co. v. McShane (1874) 22 Wall. 444; (7) County of Cass v. Johnston (1877) 95 U.S. 360; (8) Fairfield v. County of Gallatin (1879) 100 U.S. 47; (9) Tilghman v. Proctor (1880) 102 U.S. 707; (10) U.S. v. Phelps (1883) 107 U.S. 320, 323; (11) Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co. (1883) 107 U.S. 378, 387; (12) Morgan v. U.S. (1885) 113 U.S. 476, 496; (13) Leloup v. Port of Mobile (1888) 127 U.S. 640, 647; (14) Leisy v. Hardin (1890) 135 U.S. 100, 118; (15) Brenham v. German-American Bank (1892) 144 U.S. 173, 187; (16) Roberts v. Lewis (1894) 153 U.S. 367, 377; (17) Garland v. Washington (1914) 232 U.S. 642, 646; (18) U.S. v. Nice (1916) 241 U.S. 591, 601; (19) Rosen v. U.S. (1918) 245 U.S. 467, 470; (20) Boston Store v. American Graphophone Co. (1918) 246 U.S. 8, 25; and Motion Picture Co. v. Universal Plan Co. (1917) 243 U.S. 502, 518; (21) Terral v. Burke Construction Co. (1922) 257 U.S. 529, 533; (22) Lee v. Chesapeake and Ohio Ry. Co. (1923) 260 U.S. 653, 659; (23) Alpha Cement Co. v. Massachusetts (1925) 268 U.S. 203, 218; (24) Gleason v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co. (1929) 278 U.S. 349, 357; (25) Farmers Loan Co. v. Minnesota (1930) 280 U.S. 204, 209; (26) East Ohio Gas Co. v. Tax Commission (1931) 283 U.S. 465, 472; (27) Chicago and E.I.R. Co. v. Commission (1932) 284 U.S. 296; (28) New York ex rel. Northern Finance Corp. v. Lynch (1933) 290 U.S. 601; (29) Funk v. U.S. (1933); (30) West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish (1937) 300 U. S. 379; (31) Helvering v. Producers Corp. (1938) 303 U.S. 376; (32) Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins (1938) 304 U.S. 64, 69, 79; (33) Graves v. N.Y. ex rel. O'Keefe (1939) 306 U.S. 466; (34) O'Malley v. Woodrough (1939) 307 U.S. 277; (35) Madden v. Kentucky (1940) 309 U.S. 83; (36) Helvering v. Hallock (1940) 309 U.S. 106; (37) U.S. v. Darby (1941) 312 U.S. 100; (38) U.S. v. Chicago, M.St.P. and P.R. Co. (1941) 312 U.S. 592; (39) Nye v. U.S. (1941) 313 U.S. 33; (40) California v. Thompson (1941) 313 U.S. 109; (41) Olsen v. Nebraska (1941) 313 U.S. 236; (42) Alabama v. King and Boozer (1941) 314 U.S. 1; (43) State Tax Commission v. Aldrich (1942) 316 U.S. 174; (44) Williams v. North Carolina (1942) 317 U.S. 287; (45) Brady v. Roosevelt S.S. Co. (1943) 317 U.S. 575; (46) Jones v. Opelika (1943) 319 U.S. 103 (reargument); (47) Board of Education v. Barnette (1943) 319 U.S. 624; (48) Smith v. Allwright (1944) 321 U.S. 649; (49) Girouard v. U.S. (1946) 328 U.S. 61; (50) Angel v. Burlington (1947) 330 U.S. 183; (51) Lincoln Union v. Northwestern (1949) 335 U.S. 525; (52) Commissioner v. Church (1949) 335 U.S. 632, 637; (53) Oklahoma Tax Commission v. Texas Co. (1949) 336 U.S. 342; (54) Cosmopolitan Co. v. McAllister (1949) 337 U.S. 783; (55) U.S. v. Rabinowitz (1950) 339 U.S. 56, 66, 85; (56) Joseph Burstyn Inc., v. Wilson (1952) 343 U.S. 495, 502; (57) Brown v. Board of Education (1954) 347 U.S. 483, 491, 494–495; (58) Reid v. Covert (1957) 354 U.S. 1; (59) Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt (1957) 354 U.S. 416, 419; (60) Ladner v. U.S. (1958) 358 U.S. 169 (on rehearing); (61) S.S. Monrosa v. Carbon Black, Inc. (1959) 359 U.S. 180; (62) U.S. v. Raines (1960) 362 U.S. 17, 27; (63) Elkins v. U.S. (1960) 364 U.S. 206, 210, 212–213, 283; (64) James v. U.S. (1961) 366 U.S. 213, 215, 221, 223, 241; (65) Mapp v. Ohio (1961) 366 U.S.; (66) Gladden Company v. Zdanok (1962) 370 U.S. 530, 542, 585.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, in addition, Congress has in the 30-year span between 1931 and 1961 enacted 27 specific pieces of legislation to nullify Supreme Court decisions to correct the mischief wrought by the decisions of the Court.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a list of the decisions in questions and their nullifying acts.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Milliken v. United States, 283 U.S. 15 (1931) (gifts in contemplation of death; estate tax). Nullifying acts: 46 Stat. 1516 (1931); 74 C.R. 7078–7079; 7198–7199 (1931).

2. Kessler v. Strecker, 307 U.S. 22 (1939) (deportation of alien Communists). Nullifying acts: 54 Stat. 670, 673, sec. 22 (1940).

3. U.S. v. Underwriters Assn., 322 U.S. 533 (1944) (Federal regulation of insurance companies). Nullifying acts: 59 Stat. 33 (1945); 15 U.S.C. 1011–1015.

4. Brooklyn Bank v. O'Neil, 324 U.S. 697 (1945). Nullifying act: 61 Stat. 84 (1947).

Schulte Co. v. Gangi, 328 U.S. 108 (1946). Nullifying acts: 61 Stat. 84 (1947); 63 Stat. 910, 920 (1949).

Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., 328 U.S. 680 (1946) (portal-to-portal pay under FLSA). Nullifying acts: 61 Stat. 84 (1947); 63 Stat. 910, 920 (1949).

5. Packard Co. v. Labor Board, 330 U.S. 485 (1947) (foreman and supervisory employees entitled as a class to bargain collectively under NLRA). Nullifying acts: 61 Stat. 186, 137, sec. 2 (1947); 29 U.S.C. 152(3).

6. United States v. Silk, 337 U.S. 704 (1947) ("employees" for purpose of social security employment tax). Nullifying acts: 62 Stat. 438 (1948); 26 U.S.C. 3121(d), 3306(i).

7. Taucey v. N.Y. Life Ins. Co., 314 U.S. 118 (1941) (Federal courts forbidden to stay in personam proceeding in a State court embracing a cause already litigated in Federal tribunal). Nullifying acts: 62 Stat. 869, 968 (1948); 28 U.S.C. 2283. (See H. Rept. No. 308; 80th Cong., 1st sess., pp. A 181–182 (1947).)

8. Dobson v. Commissioner, 320 U.S. 489 (1943) (nonreviewability of certain Tax Court determinations). Nullifying acts: 62 Stat. 869, 991 sec. 36 (1948); 26 U.S.C. 7482(a).

9. United States v. Wyoming, 331 U.S. 440 (1947) (rejection of State's claim of title in certain school lands included in a Federal petroleum reserve). Nullifying act: 62 Stat. 1233 (1948).

10. Bay Ridge Co. v. Aaron, 334 U.S. 446 (1948) (payment of overtime on overtime under FLSA). Nullifying acts: 63 Stat. 446 (1949); 29 U.S.C. 207(d).

11. Comm'r v. Estate of Church, 335 U.S. 632 (1949); Estate of Spiegel v. Comm'r, 335 U.S. 701 (1949) (estate tax). Nullifying acts; 63 Stat. 891, 894, sec. 7 (1949); 26 U.S.C. 2035–2037.

12. Martino v. Mich. Window Cleaning Co., 327 U.S. 172 (1946) (coverage under FLSA of local window washing contractor whose customers manufactured goods shipped in interstate); Roland Co. v. Walling, 326 U.S. 657 (1946) (covering under FLSA of local electrical contractor who serviced nearby industrial establishments); Farmers Irrigation Co. v. McComb, 337 U.S. 755 (1949) (covering under FLSA a farmers' irrigation cooperative). Nullifying acts: 63 Stat. 910, 911, 917 (1949); 29 U.S.C. 203j, 213(a) (2, 6).

13. Commissioner v. Smith, 324 U.S. 177 (1945) (compensation through exercise of stock option-taxability). Nullifying acts: 64 Stat. 906, 942, sec. 218 (1950); 26 U.S.C. 421.

14. Commissioner v. Korrell, 339 U.S. 619 (1950) (amortization of bond premium-taxability). Nullifying acts: 64 Stat. 906, 941, sec. 217 (1950); 26 U.S.C. 171(b)(1).

15. Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33 (1950) (application of Administrative Procedure Act to deportation of aliens). Nullifying act: 64 Stat. 1044, 1048 (1950).

16. Commissioner v. Tower, 327 U.S. 280 (1946); Lusthaus v. Commissioner, 327 U.S. 293 (1946); Commissioner v. Culbertson, 337 U.S. 733 (1949), (taxation of family partnerships). Nullifying acts: 65 Stat. 452, 511, sec. 340 (1951); 26 U.S.C. 704.

17. Wilmotte Park Dist. v. Campbell, 338 U.S. 411 (1949) (amusement tax). Nullifying acts: 65 Stat. 453, 519, sec. 402 (1951); 26 U.S.C. 4233(a)(4).

18. Bindczyck v. Finucane, 342 U.S. 76 (1951) (Nationality Act precludes State courts from annulling their own naturalization). Nullifying act: 66 Stat. 163, 262, sec. 340(j).

19. Cline v. Kaplan, 323 U.S. 97 (1944) (party against whose property a trustee in bankruptcy had asserted a claim is competent to withdraw from summary jurisdiction of bankruptcy court at any time before judgment). Nullifying acts: 66 Stat. 420–421, sec. 2 (1952); 11 U.S.C. 11(a) (7) (see S. Rept. 1395; 83d Cong., 2d sess., p. 3 (1952)).

20. Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Corp., 341 U.S. 384 (1951) (inapplicability of Federal fair trade law to nonsigners of resale price maintenance contracts). Nullifying acts: 66 Stat. 631 (1952); 15 U.S.C. 45(a).

21. United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19 (1947); United States v. Louisiana, 339 U.S. 699 (1950); United States v. Texas, 339 U.S. 707 (1950) Federal dominion over offshore oil (submerged lands)). Nullifying acts: 67 Stat. 29 (1953); 43 U.S.C. 1301–1314.

22. United States v. Cardiff, 344 U.S. 19 (1952) (inspections under Pure Food Drug and Cosmetic Act). Nullifying acts: 67 Stat. 476 (1953); 21 U.S.C. 374.

23. Power Comm'n v. East Ohio Gas Co., 338 U.S. 464 (1950) (regulation of distributors of natural gas selling exclusively to local consumers in one State). Nullifying acts: 68 Stat. 36 (1954; 15 U.S.C. 717(c).

24. United States v. Wunderlich, 342 U.S. 98 (1951) (nonreviewability of Government contracts having finality clauses). Nullifying acts: 68 Stat. 81 (1954); 41 U.S.C. 321–322.

25. Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Wisconsin, 347 U.S. 672 (1954) (Federal regulations of rates of facilities used in production and gathering of natural gas). Nullifying acts: Natural gas bill of 1956 (vetoed) 102 C.R. 2897 (1956); H. Rept. No. 992 on H.R. 6645; 84th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1 (1955).

26. Maritime Board v. Isbrandtsen Co., 356 U.S. 481 (1958) (dual shipping rate contracts unlawful). Nullifying acts: 72 Stat. 574 (1958), 75 Stat. 762 (1961), 46 U.S.C. 812, 813b.

27. Guss v. Utah Labor Board, 353 U.S. 1, 15 n. 7 (1957) etc. (no man's land; State courts and agencies precluded from asserting jurisdiction over labor disputes as to which NLRB had declined to cede or to assert jurisdiction). Nullifying acts: 73 Stat. 519, 541, sec. 701 (1959); 29 U.S.C. 164.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, for the foregoing compilations of cases I am indebted to the American Law Section of the Library of Congress.

Mr. President, what are we to conclude from the constitutional upheaval that has taken place? Are we to conclude that superior wisdom has inhered in the Justices of recent vintage, as compared with those sitting during the first 143 years or so of the Court? Granting that the Constitution is a living, breathing organ which allows for growth and has the vitality to be accommodated to the changing times is one thing; discarding the learning or pretty much of all the learning that has previously prevailed is another thing. I think it may fairly be stated that there is not contempt alone for all that has gone before but an excessive devotion to doctrines imported from extra-legal domain that is responsible for this legal revolution. Certainly a proper reverence for the accumulated knowledge and wisdom of the centuries does not comport with what has been taking place on the Court.

When the proper domain of the law is invaded by social theories and hypothesses that have no legitimate claim to recognition, sound legal doctrine suffers thereby and the foundations of a hallowed judicial system begin to totter.

But if we honor the admirable method of the common law and restore it, we could be on our way back to restoring the legal system that has served us so well. This was the Anglo-Saxon legal system described by the judge in John Galsworthy's play, "Justice," as a "majestic edifice, sheltering all of us, each stone of which rests on another."

Let us not substitute sand for stone in our highest legal edifice. Rather, by this single proposal, let us supply the stone of judicial experience.

I emphasize again that this is no attack on the Court as such, nor is it an attempt to discredit any member of the Court. This is a plea for recognition of time-honored and time-tested values of judicial experience and judicial maturity in at least one-half of the nominees to the highest Court of the land.

Further, it is a plea that the U.S. Senate shall forthwith return to its constitutional duty and power of giving advice in the choice of the nominees before they are nominated. This can be done in advance without reference to any individual and without embarrassment to any President. The Senate in the exercise of its constitutional power should announce that at least one of each two successive nominees confirmed by the Senate for Associate Justice of the Supreme Court shall have at least 10 years' prior judicial experience. This would be a salutary start, and other steps could follow.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

DAIRY LEGISLATION HEARINGS

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, in the past 5 years the Congress has enacted laws modifying our programs on wheat, corn, and other feed grains, and also our cotton and rice programs. But somehow we have failed to modify the milk or dairy legislation which we now have on the statute books, notwithstanding the fact that the dairy program is one of the most costly programs we have.

Mr. President, beginning on next Monday morning, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will hold hearings on proposed dairy legislation. It is my hope that at the conclusion of the hearings, the committee will be able to recommend legislation for improvements in our current dairy programs. I have invited representatives of the various dairy and milk producer organizations to give testimony. I am hopeful they will be able to make some constructive suggestions toward developing a means of adequately supporting the income of milk producers, without the recurrent accumulation of excessive quantities of dairy products by the Government, at a high cost, as has been the case under the present law.

The dairy price-support program has been one of the most costly programs administered by the Department of Agriculture. The realized losses by the Goverment on this program over the past 10 years have exceeded $2.5 billion. Milk is an important commodity, and I realize that these expenditures have represented only about 5 percent of the income received by milk producers; but this is still a very costly program.

Two years ago, major dairy organizations were urging that the price-support level for milk be increased because producers incomes were too low. No one disputed the fact that dairy-farm income was low; and in the Congress there was strong bipartisan support for increasing the support level above the $3.22 per hundredweight level which prevailed at that time. The Secretary of Agriculture, in good faith, granted an increase to $3.40 per hundredweight for the 1961–62 marketing year.

Without any means of keeping milk supplies in check, the Commodity Credit Corporation purchases of surplus dairy products began to rise. They rose both as a result of increasing milk production and an inopportune decline in milk consumption. Commodity Credit Corporation purchases of dairy products doubled, and Government expenditure for dairy price support increased from less than $300 million to over $600 million in a year's time. As a result, it was necessary to lower the support level again to the minimum support level permitted by the law; and, even so, it appears that we shall continue to spend in the neighborhood of $500 million a year.

In the last few months, milk production has fallen off slightly from the levels of a year ago; but at this early date we cannot be assured that it is the beginning of any sustained downward trend in production.

With slightly lower beef prices in prospect for the coming year, it is unlikely that there will be any great reduction in cow numbers; and with just an average increase in productivity, milk production will set a new record in the coming year, leaving little possibility that the surplus problem will disappear.

INTRODUCTION BY SENATOR KARL E. MUNDT ON "WHATS WRONG WITH OUR LABOR UNIONS"

In his early twenties, Maurice R. Franks, author of this book, became associated with the American labor movement. His first official capacity was that of organizer and business agent for one of our railroad brotherhoods, the Switchmen's Union of North America. In the course of that service he first came to know at ground level the sentiments and aspirations of the hourly worker, the organized and unorganized alike.

His incumbency likewise brought him into close contact with union leadership at a time when its idealism ran high and when, apart from inevitable radical fringes, the main line of union action was wholly consistent with the public conscience and the dynamic functioning of the American economy.

The efforts of established unionism in those days were under the tutelage of such labor statesmen as Samuel Gompers and were directed toward seeking for labor a greater measure of individual freedom, as opposed to regimentation—a larger degree of social integration, as opposed to further fomentation of class consciousness. The economic program of Gompers and men of his stamp called for labor-management partnership in production and reward, even as it sturdily disowned the antics of some militant sectors in pursuit of radical social change.

The Gompers program of pure and simple unionism and the evolutionary, rather than revolutionary, techniques it proposed took root in the young and eager mind of Maurice Franks and there supplied both substance and energy for his own developing philosophy of labor.

Meanwhile, with both feet and his whole heart planted firmly in the labor movement, Maurice Franks also saw far beyond the routine tasks of service to his union. Like so many of our Nation's foreign born—he had come as a child to the United States from Ireland—the sense of public spirit that came into being with his citizenship went considerably beyond the average. He had a mind fiercely dedicated to American principle. He also had a fluent tongue and a voice prepared to carry far and wide the message of human dignity and all-round fairplay, which since the beginning had been the core of America's message to the world.

As a delegate to the Minnesota State Federation of Labor and at other union conclaves, he fearlessly voiced his convictions, and over the years developed into a public speaker and lecturer in constantly increasing demand.

Maurice Franks also turned early to the written word, worked hard to develop a strong and communicative style and eventually became a labor editor of considerable renown. In 1940 he founded the Railroad Workers' Journal, as the official organ of a brave and independent brotherhood, the Railroad Yardmasters of North America, Inc. This well-rounded monthly magazine served as a mouthpiece for his constructive union philosophy until 1948, when, as founder and first president of the National Labor-Management Foundation, he also became the editor of that organization's official publication, Partners.

Like all good Irishmen, Maurice R. Franks is a fighter. And throughout his career he has been battling for the greater good of the American economy, as the greatest single servant of us all. He has challenged its enemies wherever he encountered them whether in politics, management, or at any level of organized labor. And with equal intensity he has fought in defense of its friends and constructive contributors, again on whichever side of the industrial fence they stood. In fact, his chief assault has been against the fence itself, believing with unwavering consistency that labor and management, the employer and his wage earner, are not natural-born enemies but are the closest of mutual friends—in Longfellow's words, "As unto the bow the cord is * * *. Useless each without the other."

His constructive viewpoint could not help but bring Franks into violent collision with those among the leaders of modern unionism who were becoming more concerned with partisan politics and social planning than with the functions of collective bargaining.

Throughout the New Deal decade, Franks was something of a one-man committee within the labor movement, a voice crying out from the wilderness of blueprints for "The More Abundant Life." He protested vigorously against the philosophy underlying the Wagner Act—that union organization should be achieved through compulsion rather than persuasion based on proven accomplishment. From the day the Wagner Act appeared on the statute books Maurice Franks began tirelessly campaigning for its reform. Many of the reforms advocated by Mr. Franks were incorporated in the Taft-Hartley amendments enacted in 1947.

However, he felt that Taft-Hartley still left much room for improvement. His vigilance in behalf of the legitimate rights of individual workers continued. His public condemnation of protected oligarchies within the union system; his expressed contempt for those, both businessman and labor leader, who sought personal profit at the expense of union member or employer through such devices as the "sweetheart contract"; and his oft-repeated concern over the continuing decline of democratic practices and procedures in many labor organizations all preceded by many years the public indignation sparked by the revelations of our Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor and Management Field.

With mounting popular sentiment for reform of labor-management laws, Maurice Franks found doors, once closed, suddenly opening to his suggestions for statutorily guaranteed democratic procedures in union elections and strike decisions and for the mandatory bonding of union officials having fiscal responsibilities.

Maurice Franks could take much personal gratification in the adoption of the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959 where some of his recommendations at long last became the law of the land.

His crusade carries on—for he recognizes that statutory mandates and guarantees are in a large sense meaningless, if those they are designed to protect aind those they are designed to control do not invoke them on the one hand and observe them on the other. He sees the future vitality of labor organizations inextricably tied to the capacity of leaders and members alike to comprehend the very useful and legitimate role which collective bargaining was historically created to provide within the total structure of a free society. This book represents a sincere effort to promote this essential understanding of basic purpose. Its criticism of both persons and practices is frank and unvarnished. This cards-on-the-table approach is typical of the author. His commentaries on the weaknesses which he sees in modern unionism are certain to make him the target of much hot-tongued abuse. Experience has taugh him to expect this, but, thankfully, has not dampened his willingness to enunciate his fundamental convictions. My own association with Maurice Franks has convinced me that he believes strongly in the need for organization within the Nation's labor force. As a matter of fact, he believes the necessity for organization is so self-evident that it will occur naturally without the pressures of governmental coercion and contractual compulsion.

I welcome the publication of this book by a man whose friendship I enjoy and whose counsel I esteem. I welcome it and wish it success as an unfettered purview of a growing economic problem and an uncluttered expression of commonsense in the down-to-earth solutions it proposes. "What's Wrong With Our Labor Unions" is not a death sentence. It is a guideline for correction.

---

ANTI-COURT ELEMENTS NOW WANT TO DESTROY THE AMERICAN FEDERAL SYSTEM

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, since the 1954 desegregation decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, certain elements in our society have been engaging in attacks on the Court itself and on its individual members in the hopes of undermining public confidence in the Court and curbing its desegregation decisions. By and large these attacks have been scattered, unorganized, and ineffective because their fundamentally wrong nature has been clearly evident to the vast majority of Americans. But occasionally, as in the final days of the 85th Congress, these attacks have mounted to serious proportions, and only alert and vigorous efforts have stopped the concerted campaigns of those who would undermine the Court and its desegregation decisions through congressional action which would overrule its decisions on these and other controversial matters. It is no secret that most of the impetus for the attack in the 85th Congress on several of the Court's then recent decisions was in large part an anti-desegregation effort by Members who, seeing realistically that a constitutional amendment to reverse the desegregation decisions would not be approved by the Congress or the country, strove instead to undermine public confidence in the Court by attacking some of its more controversial decisions. As my colleagues will recall, the House sent to the Senate bills to legislatively reverse Court decisions and practices including the Cole decision limiting the Federal security program to sensitive jobs; the Mallory decision preventing the use in evidence of confessions obtained while Federal officers unnecessarily delay arraignment; the Nelson decision keeping responsibility for antisubversive action Federal; and the long-standing practice, which the Court had recently reaffirmed, of Federal judicial review of State criminal trials by habeas corpus. These bills were stopped in the Senate by action which has been described elsewhere, and which there is no need to review again at this time.

Now, Mr. President, the anti-Court forces have been mounting another attack, this time through applications for a series of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States which they have quietly been pushing in a number of States.

But this time, Mr. President, the attack is not simply on the Court, but on the intricate balances of the American Federal system. They would help to make this country a confederacy instead of a nation.

While the nature of these proposals will be apparent to those who study them carefully, and while official notice of these applications for amendments may unnecessarily and undeservedly dignify them, I think the Congress and the country should know the facts. There are three main proposals to undermine the Court and the Constitution which have been acted upon in some States. They are being promoted by an interestate committee and are approved by the Council of State Governments.

First, an amendment to article V, to make obligatory the proposal of amendments endorsed by two-thirds of the State legislatures, without action by Congress or by a national convention, and further, providing for the ratification of proposed amendments by the State legislatures only. Thus, Congress' present option under article V to submit amendments to State conventions would be eliminated.

Second, an amendment to eliminate Federal judicial authority over the apportionment of State legislatures and to wipe out the substantive Federal guarantees with respect to this matter.

Third, an amendment to establish a "Court of the Union," composed of the chief justices of the States, with authority to review Supreme Court decisions relating to the rights reserved to the States under the Constitution.

It is difficult to know exactly how many State legislatures have considered or acted favorably on these amendments, and there seem to be conflicting reports. However, I asked the staff of the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, of which the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is chairman, for a report on this. It appears that no system of reporting action in the States on applications for constitutional amendments has ever been established, so State action only comes to the attention of the Judiciary Committee and this subcommittee rather informally. The subcommittee staff has checked the records of the full committee, and to date it has been brought to the official attention of the committee that there have been eight approvals of the article V amendment application, nine approvals of the amendment application concerning apportionment, and four approvals of the amendment application concerning a "Court of the States."

But the current issue of Newsweek—May 20, 1963—states that the article V amendment application has in fact been approved by 11 legislatures, namely, those of Arkansas, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, New Hampshire, Missouri, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wyoming.

The application for an amendment barring the Supreme Court from ruling on the apportionment of seats in the State legislatures, according to Newsweek, has been approved by 13 legislatures; namely, Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Washington and Wyoming. These are in themselves formidable figures.

Mr. President, a notable service to the country has been given by Dr. Charles L. Black, Jr., who is Henry R. Luce Professor of Jurisprudence at the Yale Law School. In a letter to Arthur F. Fruend, dated January 7, 1963, which has been made public, and in an article which appeared in the Yale Law Journal for April 1963, Professor Black has carefully examined the meaning of these amendments, particularly the article V amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter and this article be printed in the RECORD in full, including the footnotes to the article.

The New York Times' Pulitzer Prize winning reporter, Mr. Anthony Lewis, also has very carefully written about these amendment applications. I ask unanimous consent that two articles by Mr. Lewis, from the Times of April 14 and May 2, 1963, also be printed in the RECORD.

I also ask unanimous consent that two editorials, one from the Washington Post of April 20, 1963, and the other from the New York Times of May 3, 1963, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Also, I ask unanimous consent that a brief article from the New Republic of May 4, 1963, entitled "Disunited States" be printed in the RECORD.

And further, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two articles from the Chicago Daily News of May 6, 1963, one by Robert L. Riggs which appeared first in the Louisville Courier-Journal, and the other unsigned from the Springfield bureau of the Chicago Daily News, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, it should be noted that the Chicago Daily News is one of the strongest Republican newspapers in the Nation and yet it openly describes how it was an almost solid Republican majority which got the article V measure approved in the Illinois House aided by a very small group of Democratic defectors.

I personally believe that there is a greater danger that these amendments will finally be adopted than many of the commentators seem to believe. First, some State ratifications have perhaps not been counted. Thus, the Indiana Legislature seems to believe that it has ratified one or more of these amendment applications. Moreover, I am not certain that the veto by the Governor of Nebraska of one of these applications adopted by the unicameral legislature of that State will be held to be definitive.

Second, the movement has been conducted quietly and the sponsors have obviously been keeping in the background legislatures in several States which are strongly segregationist or dominated by the gross overrepresentation of rural areas. Both of these interests feel themselves threatened and aggrieved by the decisions of the Supreme Court. We are therefore likely to see next year a large number of States which will rush to approve and submit these applications. This may well create a bandwagon psychology which will sweep other States into the fold. These proposals are indeed time bombs under the American constitutional system.

It will be interesting to see what the American Bar Association will do. That body led the fight for the Bricker amendment which would have fatally crippled the President's power to conduct our foreign relations and it was a sponsor of the no-third-term amendment. I do not remember that it ever opposed the proposed amendment to limit the Federal income tax to 25 percent which would either have crippled our defense efforts or forced a national sales tax. As Solicitor-General Cox and Professor Black have commented, I have not seen any activity of the bar in opposing the current proposed amendments. Yet they are clearly designed to make the 14th, 15th and 1st amendments inoperative and to perpetuate the archaic and unfair overrepresentation of the thinly populated areas within so many of our States. It will be interesting to see if the bar associations stand aside as the Constitution is subverted by a minority and if the big States and urban populations are shackled and human rights are disregarded.

But whatever the attitude of the bar may be, the people of the United States should wake up and not, as in my State, allow these amendments to go through because of inertia.

EXHIBIT 1

JANUARY 7, 1963.

ARTHUR J. FREUND, ESQ.,
St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR MR. FREUND: I have received your letter of December 29, 1962, describing the three proposals recently approved by the Assembly of the States (meeting under the auspices of the Council of State Governments), and enclosing copies of these and of a report of that assembly's National Legislative Conference Committee on Federal-State Relations. I note that the assembly has recorded its support of—

(a) An amendment to article V, to make obligatory the proposal of amendments endorsed by two-thirds of the State legislatures (without action by Congress or by a national convention), and providing for the ratification of proposed amendments by the State legislatures only, eliminating Congress present option to submit them to State conventions.

(b) An amendment which would eliminate Federal judicial authority over the apportionment of State legislatures, and wipe out substantive Federal guarantees respecting this matter.

(c) An amendment to establish a Court of the Union, composed of the chief justices of the States, with authority to review Supreme Court decisions relating to the rights reserved to the States under the Constitution.

These proposed amendments are set out at large in the other enclosures in your letter. If you will allow me, I will comment on them as briefly as may be.

It must be a matter for astonishment that such proposals should find support among those to whom the honored word "conservative" is often applied. The proposals are radical in the extreme. They aim not at the preservation but at the subversion of that balance in Federal-State relations which has, in the words of a report advocating them, enabled us to escape the evils of despotism and totalitarianism. They negate one of the best-authenticated master principles of our American political being, the principle that we are a unified nation, having a unitary interest in the maintenance of our Federal Constitution, and expressing that interest through national deliberations and decisions, and (since we are a people attached to law) through our national courts. They constitute, collectively, one more attempt, so late in the day, at converting the United States into a confederation, wherein the interests of the American people as a whole people, acting together politically and morally, would be shattered into disjecta membra. The wisdom of peace and the sacrifices of war alike warn against starting down that ruinous road.

Since the first and third of the proposals are more general than the second, they more generally illustrate the characteristics referred to, and may therefore be taken up first.

The first proposal is that article V be so changed as to make obligatory the proposal of amendments desired by two-thirds of the State legislatures, without any congressional deliberation and without the calling of a national convention. The most striking (and perhaps most shocking) characteristic of this proposal is that it provides for amendment of the National Constitution without there having been, from first to last, any national deliberation anywhere. Like all political structures, this one expresses a political idea—the idea that the American people are not a unified people, and that the adoption of amendments to their Constitution is of no concern to them in their character as citizens of a nation. National questions ought surely at some stage to be deliberated upon in a national forum. Only thus can the attention of the Nation be brought to a focus upon them; only thus can they receive the consideration of representatives whose responsibility in office is the welfare of the country as a whole.

As contrasted with the method of amendment always hitherto used, the proposal clearly has another shocking characteristic; it altogether eliminates the popular principle from the amendment process, by taking the House of Representatives out of that process. Under the method heretofore used, to put the manner summarily, an amendment, to be proposed, must not only pass through the Senate, where the States are represented equally, but also the House of Representatives, where the people are (at least roughly) represented pro rata. This long-sanctioned method transfers to the amendment process the basic compromise on which our Nation was formed. The present proposal destroys this balance; paradoxically, it makes it possible for an amendment to be proposed and passed without any assent from a body representing the national citizenry as such, though a simple act of Congress cannot be passed without such assent. Again, the theoretical underpinning is clear—the American people are seen not as a people, but as the distributed inhabitants of a confederacy.

This want of popular representation in the proposed amending process is made the more dangerous by the fact that many of our State legislatures are grossly unrepresentative of the people within their States. Whether or not we approve of Baker v. Carr, and whatever may be the appropriate Federal constitutional standards for representation in State legislatures considered strictly in their local character, how could we wish to commit the process of Federal constitutional amendment to the uncontrolled action of legislatures that (as published statistics irrefutably show) are very far from reflecting with accuracy the composition even of their own State citizenry? (This point is underscored by the fact that the proponents of this scheme, in their "Report," are concerned to eliminate the State Governors from the amendment process.)

It may be said that, under the alternative and never-used convention method of article V, Congress may now be compelled, by State initiative, to call conventions for the purpose of proposing constitutional amendments, and that the House of Representatives may thereby be circumvented. But article V does not provide that, in such a convention, the popular principle of representation is not to be expressed, and the House of Representatives (or, for that matter, the Senate), as a condition to its assent to the call, might insist on appropriate provision to this end. Such provision would be consonant with the whole spirit of our Government, which is based squarely on the notion that, in the making of national decisions, both the people and the States are to be represented.

The amendment proposal, then, would subvert the deepest principle of our political life—that we are a whole Nation, and that the resolution of national questions calls for debate and action in a national forum. It would remove from the amendment process the necessity for the assent of the American people, in that body where they are represented as such. It would make possible the changing of any feature of our national political structure wholly by the disjoined and divided actions, severally debated and taken, of the representatives, it might be, of a minority of the people. It sets at nothing all the wisdom we have gained at great price, and ought to be firmly rejected.

The third, or Court of the Union, proposal, is vulnerable to a number of criticisms which may be considered minor only in relation to its major fault in principle. This Court would lack two prime characteristics of courts in our legal tradition; it would be, beyond argument, too large for effective judicial deliberation, and, meeting sporadically, it could never form any institutional tradition. Its members would be judges chosen for their attainments and promise in other fields than Federal constitutional law. In the main, they would be elected by diverse electorates; whatever may be the suitability of this method for the choosing of State judges, its rejection, for the judges who were principally to interpret the Constitution, was a prime point with the framers, and has served us well for nearly two centuries. A majority of this "court" could easily represent a very small minority of the American people. Its members would be subject to State legislative pressure. The mind staggers at the notion that the wisdom of article III and of section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, repeatedly reenacted in material substance, should come down to this—that the masterwork of Marshall and Story, of Taney, of Taft and Hughes and Holmes, should be turned over to a "court" so constituted.

But the radical fault of the proposal lies deeper. The American people are committed, as firmly as they are to anything, to the powerful and life-giving idea that our Constitution is law, and that its character as national law can only be upheld by giving its final interpretation into the hands of a national judiciary. In the selection of that judiciary both the States and the people are now well represented, by the President and by the Senate. But the Federal judge himself is an officer of the Nation, expressing, as light is given him, the interest of the Nation in the even maintenance of its constitutional balances. The destruction of this idea, and the substitution of the idea that final judgment on constitutional questions is to be made by judicial representatives of the States, taken one by one, again can rest only on the theory, denied by the best thought and the best blood of our history, that we are not a Nation but a league.

The second proposal (the reversal by constitutional amendment of Baker v. Carr) goes to a more specific problem than does either of the proposals discussed above. What it amounts to is a withdrawal of Federal protection from a designated area of political life.

This proposal, if passed, would constitute the first diminution, since our history began, of any Federal constitutional guarantee of liberty, justice, or equality. More specifically, the equal protection clause has up to now been left, as it came into the Constitution, entirely general; "equal protection of the laws", not as to some matters but as to all, is one of the chief things our Nation promises us in return for what it asks of us. To begin cutting down our constitutional guarantees, to begin introducing exceptions here and there into the concept of equality under law, are solemn steps indeed. The possibility (and it remains no more than that) that some of the grosser present abuses in State apportionments may be weeded out by Federal judicial action is not an appealing ground for embarkation on these treacherous seas.

And this proposal goes very far. It would reach beyond 14th amendment equal protection, and sanction the States in using apportionment as a guise for rank racial discrimination, in contravention of at least the purpose and spirit of the 15th amendment. (The Tuskegee gerrymander case makes this possibility far from fanciful.) It would open a breach in the Federal guarantee, thought essential by the Framers, of a "republican form of government" in each State, for by its clear terms it would prevent not only the judiciary but Congress from acting to implement that guarantee, as long as malapportionment, however gross, was the vehicle of oppression. Whatever the constitutional provision concerned, the proposal would make invulnerable not merely such abuses in State representation as now exist, but also others far more gross; we would be overoptimistic, in view of the British experience and of our own shifting population trends, if we assumed that these could not occur. This proposal, moreover, would remove from any Federal control that abuse in State government which is the most likely to be self-perpetuating, since its correction, absent such control, must come from those who profit by it.

In association with the other two proposals, this one takes on an even darker tone. Together, these proposals would, at one and the same time, place the amending power in the uncontrolled hands of the State legislatures, place the final construction of the Constitution in the hands of judges whose offices are created and whose salaries are paid by the State legislatures, and then exempt the same State legislatures from any effective policing, by court or Congress, of their representative character. That such proposals should be thrust forward as a means of restoring a balance between Nation and State benumbs comment.

Against them may be put the basic postulates that have served us since 1787. First, questions of national import, including most preeminently questions having to do with the amending of the Constitution, are for national debate, in a national forum, by people whose offices give them national responsibility; such questions are to be dealt with, in part, by a body such as our House of Representatives, so constituted as to represent the American people in a true numerical proportion, and not only State by State. Secondly, the Constitution is law, to be interpreted, as all law must be interpreted, in court; since its interpretation concerns the entire and integral American Nation, final judgment, which must rest somewhere, is to rest with the judicial officers of the whole Nation, selected on a national basis, by a national process, wherein both States and people have a part. Thirdly, the maintenance of basic guarantees of liberty, justice, and equality, cutting across all the concerns of public life, is in the national material and moral interest, and is to be implemented by the substance of constitutional law and by the Federal judicial process. These things are at the heart of our greatness as a Nation; let us hope that we will not, as these proposals would have us do, fritter them away.

With all best wishes.

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES L. BLACK, Jr.

FACULTY NOTES—THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF ARTICLE V: A THREATENED DISASTER

(By Charles L. Black, Jr., Henry R. Luce, professor of jurisprudence, Yale Law School)

Three proposals for amending the Constitution have recently come from the Council of State Governments, and are being propelled down the never-before-used alternative route of article V—the route via State applications to Congress for the calling of a convention.[1] Of the three, one (which would establish a Court of the Union, composed of the State chief justices in all their multitude, to meet on extraordinary occasions to review judgments of the Supreme Court)[2] is so patently absurd that it will probably sink without trace. Another, eradicating[3] Baker v. Carr[4] concerns a special subject, and hence does not generally affect the Federal power or the whole shape of the Union. The third is of supreme interest to students of constitutional law. Its adoption would effect a constitutional change of a higher order of importance than any since 1787—if one excepts (and that only doubtfully) the de facto change implicit in the result of the Civil War.

It is wonderful that this proposal—which has already commended itself to a number of State legislatures[5]—has been so little noticed. This is doubtless because the proposed change is in procedure. But a change in the procedure of constitutional amendment—unless it is purely formal, and this one is not—is a change in the distribution of ultimate power. The proposed article V, if adopted, would make it easily possible for a proportion of the American people no greater than that which supported Landon in 1936 to impose on the rest of the country any alteration whatever in the Constitution. The people who could do this would be, by and large, those inhabitants of the less populous States who reside in the districts that are overrepresented in their own State legislatures. "Unto him that hath it shall be given." This component of the population—to which we are all accustomed to conceding a veto power on constitutional amendment, as on many other matters—would under the proposed plan have something very different from a veto power. It would have the affirmative power of forcing its will on the majority, as to anything which may be the subject of constitutional amendment—that is to say, as to everything. Such a proposal ought to be scrutinized with the very greatest care, and the same careful scrutiny should be given to the method by which its proponents hope to coerce its submission to the State legislatures for ratification as an amendment.

THE PROPOSED NEW ARTICLE V

If this proposal were to win its way through, article V would read as follows:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States. Whenever applications from the legislatures of two-thirds of the total number of States of the United States shall contain identical texts of an amendment to be proposed, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall so certify, and the amendment as contained in the application shall be deemed to have been proposed, without further action by Congress. No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."[6]

It may be convenient to the reader to have set out the text of the present article V:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."[7]

The proposed plan, it will be seen, abolishes the (never used) "convention" way of amendment, and puts in its place a method wholly under the control, as to substance and procedure, of the State legislatures. It does this by making it mandatory that Congress submit for ratification any amendment called for by the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, and by simultaneously taking away Congress' power to elect the State convention mode of ratification.

At present, an amendment may be passed (and all have actually passed in this way) if two-thirds of each National House wants it, and if it is ratified by three-fourth of the States in the manner chosen by Congress. One might also pass if (on proper application of two-thirds of the States) a convention, summoned by Congress and having such structure as Congress thought wise to give it, proposed the amendment, and if it were then ratified in the manner chosen by Congress.

Along the new route opened by the proposed article V. Congress would control neither substance nor procedure. Three-fourths of the State legislatures, without the consent of any other body, could change the Presidency to a committee of three, hobble the treaty power, make the Federal judiciary elective, repeal the fourth amendment, make Catholics ineligible for public office, and move the National Capital to Topeka. These are (in part at least) cartoon illustrations. But the cartoon accurately renders the de jure picture, and seems exaggerated only because we now conceive that at least some of these actions have no appeal to anybody. Some amendments—e.g., something like the Bricker amendment—would be very likely of early passage. At present the main dangers would be to civil and political rights, to national conduct of foreign relations, and to the Federal taxing power. But (particularly since the proposed change would be absolutely irreversible, 13 States being enough to block its reversal) the cartoon does not exaggerate the possibilities of the long future. A country in which the large majority would have to dread and sometimes submit to constitutional innovations appealing only to a minority could not call itself, even poetically, a democracy, and the possible tensions between consensus and Constitution would be dangerous in the extreme.

At present, when an amendment passes the House and the Senate by two-thirds, there is fair ground for the inference that there is national consensus upon it; at least the means of ascertaining that crucial fact, though rough, are fairly well adapted to the end. If the national convention method, under the present article V, were ever to be used, Congress, in setting up the convention, could insure that it be so representative as to be likely to express a national consensus. Congress even retains control over the ratification process; if the State legislatures were in its view to come to be dangerously unrepresentative, Congress could provide for ratification by State conventions so chosen as accurately to reflect the views of each State's people. Properly used, the present article V can insure that no constitutional change be effected which is disliked, deplored, or detested by a distinct majority of the American people.

What is the situation under the proposed new article V? Here one must talk numbers—even statistics of a rough kind. Let us note first that the 38 least populous States, whose legislatures could under the proposed article V repeal the full faith and credit clause, contain about 40 percent of the country's population.[8] That really ought to be enough. That these particular people should, in the name of federalism, have a veto power, is acceptable; at least it is accepted beyond change. What rational ground could there be for giving them, in addition, the power affirmatively to govern the rest of the people?

But of course one cannot stop there. The power given by the new article V is not in the States but in their legislatures. It cannot be too strongly stressed that one need not approve of Baker v. Carr[9] in order to accept the fact, as a fact, that the State legislatures do not accurately represent the people of their States—that a majority in each house of most State legislatures can be made up of votes representing a distinct minority of the State's people. This situation may have a certain romantic appeal,[10] even if one does not appreciate its beauty, one may not think the remedying of it a fit job for the Federal courts. But neither of these judgments supports the conclusion that the uncontrolled power of Federal con-

[1] All are set out in full, with an account of their espousal by the council, in "Amending the Constitution To Strengthen the States in the Federal System," 36 State Government 10 (1963).

[2] Id. at 13–14.

[3] By abolishing all substantive Federal guarantees against malapportionment, thus making action by Congress as well as by court impossible, and by withdrawing the subject entirely from Federal judicial power. 36 State Government at 12.

[4] 369 U.S. 186 (1962) (14th amendment claim against State legislative malapportionment held within Federal judicial jurisdiction).

[5] According to information informally received, the Legislatures of Arkansas, Florida, Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Wyoming have already passed the resolution set out in text accompanying note 13 infra. In about an equal number of States, one house has passed it.

[6] 36 State governments 11–12 (1963); see text accompanying note 13 infra.

[7] U.S. Constitution, art. V.

[8] Calculated from the 1960 census, 1963 World Almanac, 255. The author is ill at reckoning, but the figures given here are not far off.

[9] 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[10] See Perrin, "In Defense of Country Votes," 52 Yale Rev. 16 (1962), especially at 24.

stitutional amendment should be turned over to bodies so constituted.

So back to numbers: In the best table accessible,[11] relevant data are given for 34 of the 38 least populous States of the Union. On the average, it takes 38 percent of the people in one of these States to form the constituencies of enough State senators or representatives to pass a measure through the more accurately representative house of the State legislature. Taking this figure as good enough for present purposes, if the proposed article V were in force, the income tax could be abolished, by repeal of the 16th amendment, if about 15 percent of the American people were represented by legislators who desired that result.[12]

Now of course it can be replied that such a coalition cannot be formed without the implication that a good many other people are like-minded with it. Granted; but the margin is enormous. If the right 30 percent of the people favored some amendment, its chance of passage would be very great indeed, whatever the other 70 percent might think. And it is very important that the distortion is not random but systematic—it is a distortion operating steadily in favor of rural districts and small towns. It is not too much to say that the proposed article V would enable the inhabitants of such districts to effect any change they persistently wanted in the Constitution of the United States. They may be better and wiser than the rest of us; perceptive fiction and the exacter sociology are not clear on this, but let us assume it is so. Does that justify turning the Constitution over to them, affirmatively and negatively, to keep or to change as they will?

Reference was made above to the result of the Civil War. The proposed article V rests on the theory, at least in part, that that result ought to be revised. The several States now have a crucial part in the process of constitutional amendment; the new proposal would (as far as one alternative method is concerned) give it entirely into their hands, setting at nothing the concept of national consensus among the American people considered as a whole people. It is a proposal for State rule only, on the basis of State-by-State count only, and through State institutions only, with the popular and national principles altogether submerged. If history has any lessons, our history teaches that such a location of ultimate power would put us in mortal danger.

It should only be added that this proposal, as a corollary to its discard of the concept of national consensus as a prerequisite to amendment, does away with national consideration and debate as a part of the amendment process. Under the present article V, any amendment must be examined and considered in a fully national forum—whether Congress or convention—before it goes out to the several States. Such debate focuses national attention on something which is above all of national concern. Under the proposal, the only public debate would be in 50 separate State legislatures; the rest of the process would be ministerial only. This short circuiting of national deliberation is actually one of the most offensive features of the plan.

THE MODE OF PROPOSAL

The plan of the proponents of this amendment is to see it introduced into each of the State legislatures, in the form of a resolution in the following terms:

"A joint resolution[13] memorializing Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to article V thereof

"Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That this legislature respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

" 'ARTICLE—

" 'SECTION 1. Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows:

" ' "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States. Whenever applications from the legislatures of two-thirds of the total number of States of the United States shall contain identical texts of an amendment to be proposed, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall so certify, and the amendment as contained in the application shall be deemed to have been proposed, without action by Congress. No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

" 'SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission;' be it further

"Resolved, That, if Congress shall have proposed an amendment to the Constitution identical with that contained in this resolution prior to January 1, 1965, this application for a convention shall no longer be of any force or effect; be it further

"Resolved, That a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the Congress from this State."

The hope is that, if two-thirds of the legislatures submit such a petition, Congress will consider itself bound, under the present article V, to call the convention requested.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

A number of questions arise. Some of these will be considered here, not as judicial questions, but as questions sure to come into the mind of any Congressman or Senator conscientiously seeking to do his duty.

Is the document quoted above an "application" within the meaning of article V?

Article V lays down that Congress shall "call a convention for proposing amendments," on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States. The application which can raise a conscientious obligation on Congress part must be one that asks it to "call a convention for proposing amendments." A good case can be made for the proposition that the quoted document is not such an application, but an application for something quite different—for a convention to consider whether an amendment already proposed shall be voted up or down.[14]

The process of proposal by Congress, contained in the first alternative of article V, obviously includes the process of plenary deliberation upon the whole problem to which the amendment is to address itself. It entails choice among the whole range of alternatives, as to substance and wording. It is "proposal" in the most fully substantial sense, where the proposer controls and works out the content and form of the proposition. It is very doubtful whether the same word two lines later, in the description of the second alternative, ought to be taken to denote a mechanical take-it-or-leave-it process. Under the procedure followed by the draftsmen and proponents of the present application, the convention would be in true function a part of the process of ratification.

This doubt is reinforced by the fact that the delegates who approved this language at Philadelphia were just completing the work of a "convention" of their own. Is it not likely that to them the phrase "convention for proposing amendments" meant a convention with a mandate somewhat like the one under which they had worked—a mandate to consider a set of problems and seek solutions?

The difference here is not merely formal, but sounds the deeps of political wisdom. The issue is whether it is contemplated that measures dominantly of national interest should be malleable under debate and deliberation at a national level, before going out to the several States. Such a conception of the "convention" contemplated by article V makes the second route to amendment symmetrical with the first, in the vital respect that, under both the national problem must be considered as a problem, with a wide range of possible solutions and an opportunity to raise and discuss them all in a body with national responsibility and adequately flexible power. The Congressman or Senator persuaded by this distinction would be justified in concluding that the present "applications" even if two-thirds of the States, joined, was not of the sort that obliged Congress to call a convention.[15]

Assuming these applications are not within article V, it may still be suggested that a sort of reformation might be applied—that Congress, even if not persuaded that the present applications asked for the thing contemplated by article V, ought to call such convention as it thinks it would have been [11] Compiled by the National Municipal League, New York Times, Mar. 28, 1962, p. 22, col. 3.

[12] This figure is arrived at by taking 38 percent (the percentage of people in the relevant States necessary, on the average, to control the legislature) of 40 percent (the percentage of the American people residing in the 38 least populous States).

[13] This resolution should be in whatever technical form the State employs for a single resolution of both houses of the legislature which does not require the Governor to approve or veto (36 State Government 11–12 (1963)).

[14] Even this much is more than the resolution literally allows. It asks for a convention "for the purpose of proposing" the amendment set out. Is it possible that the sponsors think the convention's role can be made ministerial?

[15] It should be noted that another and quite independent defect might be thought to vitiate these "applications." They demand the calling of a convention "for the purpose of proposing" an amendment which is, by its own text to be ratified by the State legislatures; Congress can be under a duty to comply with these applications then, only if such applications in sufficient number can place it under a duty to abdicate its own discretionary function, as clear as anything in the Constitution, of choosing between the modes of ratification, whatever may have been the mode of proposal. It is certain, on the face of article V, that no applications from any number of State legislatures can put Congress under a moral or legal obligation to do that. This quite patent error ought to lead to some suspicion of the whole theory on which these applications are drawn—the theory that Congress and the desired "convention" can be very narrowly confined in function, and that their work can be done for them in advance by the State legislatures.

obliged to call if the applications had been of the right sort. This seems clearly wrong, for several reasons. Generally, a high degree of adherence to exact form, at least in matters of importance, is desirable in this ultimate legitimating process; a constitutional amendment ought to go through a process unequivocally binding in all. Congress is given no power to call a constitutional convention when it wants to, or thinks that on the general equities perhaps it should; if Congress desires an amendment, article V very clearly tells how that desire is to be made known. Congress power as to conventions is not discretionary but strictly conditional, and if the condition is not met Congress not only need not but may not call a valid convention.

It is, moreover, illegitimate to infer, from a State's having asked for a convention to vote a textually given amendment up or down, that it desires some other sort of convention. It is not for Congress to guess whether a State which asked for the one kind of convention wants the other as a second choice. Altogether different political considerations might govern.

On the whole, then, no Member of Congress could be held to have disregarded a conscientious obligation if he took the view that the application quoted above, even if sponsored by two-thirds of the State legislatures, did not make obligatory a convention call. Indeed, he might conclude that Congress would be exceeding its powers in calling such a convention, the condition to such a call, on a fair construction of article V, not having been met.

If Congress is obligated to call a convention, what sort must it call?

The short fact here is that neither text nor history give any real help. When and if the article V condition is met, the Congress "shall call a convention"; that is all we know. Fortunately, that is all we need to know, for the "necessary and proper" clause,[16] and the common sense of McCulloch v. Maryand,[17] give all the constitutional guidance required. Since Congress is to call the convention, and since no specifications are given, and since no convention can be called without specifications of constituency, mode of election, mandate, majority necessary to "propose," and so on, then Congress obviously may and must specify on these and other necessary matters as its wisdom guides it. (It may be noted that continuing control by Congress of the whole amendment process must have been contemplated, for Congress is given, under article V, the option between modes of ratification, no matter what the method of proposal.)

If this is accepted, then no Senator or Representative is bound to vote for a convention call which in its form fails to safeguard what he believes to be vital national interests. Specifically, insistence would be thoroughly justified on an allocation of voting power by population rather than by States, on the election at large of a State's delegation or its choice in fairly apportioned districts, and on Federal conduct of the election of delegates, to prevent racial and other discrimination. Provision for a "two-thirds" rule might well be thought wise, in order to insure the same kind of consensus on this branch of article V as on the other. Since the adoption of this proposed amendment would make easily possible the future amendment of the Constitution without anything like popular consent, it is thoroughly reasonable for Congress to insist that this surrender be fully voluntary for at least this generation, unless (as is not true) some positive constitutional command to the contrary prevents.

It will probably be argued that the voting in any convention must be by States, since the voting in the original Constitutional Convention was by States. On this point, the analogy is not persuasive. The States then were in a position of at least nominal sovereignty, and were considering whether to unite. The result of the Convention would have bound no dissenting State or its people; the same was true of the acceptance of the new Constitution by the requisite nine. All these conditions are now reversed. We are already in an indissoluble union; there is a whole America people. The question in an amending convention now would be whether innovations, binding on dissenters, were to be offered for ratification. The propriety of a vote by States in the one convention surely cannot settle its rightness in the other.

Has the President a part in the convention call process?

Article I, section 7, clause 3 is as plain as language can be—

"Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

Clearly, this language literally applies to actions of Congress taken under article V.

In Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[18] it was contended that the 11th amendment had not been validly proposed, since the resolution proposing it had not been sent to the President. Against this and other arguments, the court, in a brief opinion not touching substance, upheld the amendment. In the course of argument, Justice Chase remarked: "The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation; he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution."[19]

Since that time, the practice has been not to send amendment proposals to the President. These precedents apply, of course, only to the first method prescribed by article V, since that is the only method that has been used. Hollingsworth v. Virginia is inherently weak, as the unreasoned decision must be. It introduces an exception by fiat into the entirely clear language of article I, section 7. But it need not be unfrocked in its own parish, since it is possible that the Court may have had in mind a ground for taking the first alternative of article V out of the veto process; since the congressional proposal must be by two-thirds in each house, it may have been thought that the requirement for overriding the veto was already met. This is not perhaps a very good ground, but the point about it here is that it would not exist at all if Congress, by simple majorities, called a convention under article V. Unless some other ground (better than Justice Chase's mere assertion) be stated for holding the contrary, it would seem that such a congressional action would fall as clearly as may be under the terms of article I, section 7, clause 3.

If this is right, then the grounds upon which the President might exercise his veto need be no less than those proper in the case of a Congressman voting on a convention call. If the President believed the structure and mandate of the convention significantly wrong, and dangerous to the national well-being, then he would surely be justified in vetoing the resolution.

SUMMARY

This proposal for amending article V is dangerous. It is to be hoped that it will be defeated in the State legislatures, but they are, after all, voting for or against increasing their own powers. If applications, in the form quoted above, reach Congress in sufficient number to force the issue, there is still authentic constitutional ground on which to stand. It may be that these applications call for something not contemplated by the second alternative in article V, and hence need be treated, at most, only as memorials to Congress to propose this amendment, a plea addressed entirely to discretion. It is as certain as any such matter can be that no Congressman or Senator is bound to vote for a convention call, even on impeccably proper application, wherein prudent conditions as to mandate, structure, constituency, voting, proper selection of delegates, and all the rest, are not met. There is no real reason why Presidential veto, on the same grounds, is not proper in this matter.

If all this terrain is fought over, then the American people will surrender this ultimate power into the hands of a minority only if they want to, and if they want to nobody can stop them.

---

[From the New York Times, Apr. 14, 1963]

TEN STATES ASK AMENDMENT TO CONTROL APPORTIONMENT

(By Anthony Lewis)

WASHINGTON, April 13.—The legislatures of 10 States have quietly approved a constitutional amendment to give the States a completely free hand in apportioning their legislative districts. The proposal would wipe out the Supreme Court's landmark decision last year in the Tennessee apportionment case.

The court held that legislative districts were subject to judicial scrutiny and had to meet constitutional standards of fairness.

In the last year, lower Federal and State courts have struck down legislative apportionments in 19 States. Political analysts have begun forecasting an end to rural domination of State government in this country.

The proposed amendment is designed to stop the legal and political revolution set off by the Tennessee case. It amounts to a rural counterrevolution.

The amendment would provide that nothing in the Constitution "shall restrict or limit any State in the apportionment of representation in its legislature." To make doubly sure of reaching its objective, it also says that no Federal court shall have power to hear any apportionment case.

CONVENTION SOUGHT

The amendment is one of three approved last December by the Council of State Governments. The package is being pushed by a committee of State political leaders active in the council.

The second of the three proposals would allow the States to amend the Constitution without obtaining, as is now required, the approval of Congress or of a constitutional convention. Two-thirds of the State legislatures could propose any amendment and then three-fourths adopt it.

The third amendment would set up a new "Court of the Union" to review Supreme Court decisions on Federal-State relations. It would be made up of the chief justices of the 50 States.

The sponsors are using an amendment process provided in the Constitution but never successfully invoked. This is for the legislatures of two-thirds of the States to petition Congress to call a national constitutional convention.

---

[16] U.S. Constitution, art. 1, sec. 8.

[17] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).

[18] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

[19] Id. at 380 n.a.

The two-thirds figure is 34 of the 50 States. Ten States nearly a third of the necessary total, have now approved the apportionment amendment, and several others may approve it shortly. The proposal to change the amending process has also passed 10 legislatures. Three legislatures have approved the "Court of the Union."

All this has been done in only about 3 months since the State legislatures began meeting this winter. And it has been done with no highly publicized campaign, indeed with almost no public notice.

Experts in constitutional law and others concerned about the position of the Supreme Court are beginning to take note of the amendment drive. Some are expressing great alarm.

ASSAILED AS RADICAL

Prof. Charles L. Black, Jr. of the Yale Law School, in an analysis of the three proposals has called them "radical in the extreme."

"They aim not at the preservation but at the subversion of that balance in Federal-State relations which has, in the words of the [Council of State Governments] report, enabled us to escape 'the evils of despotism and totalitarianism.'

"They constitute, collectively, one more attempt, so late in the day, at converting the United States into a confederation. * * * The wisdom of peace and the sacrifices of war alike warn against starting down that ruinous road."

As for the apportionment proposal specifically, Professor Black said that it "would constitute the first diminution, since our history began, of any Federal constitutional guarantee of liberty, justice or equality." He continued:

"To begin cutting down our constitutional guarantees, to begin introducing exception here and there into the concept of equality under law, are solemn steps indeed."

The group sponsoring the amendments is a committee of the National Legislative Conference, a subsidiary of the Council of State Governments. The committee chairman is the speaker of the Pennsylvania House, W. Stuart Helm, a Republican.

MEMBERS LISTED

Other members of the committee are the Lieutenant Governor of Kansas, Harold Chase, Republican, and these members of the lower houses of State legislatures: Warren Wood, Illinois Republican; J. D. McCarty, Oklahoma Democrat and speaker of his house; Robert Haase, Wisconsin Republican and speaker; Frederick H. Hauser, New Jersey Democrat, and William V. Chappel Jr., Florida.

Some of these committee members would have a personal interest in stopping the reapportionment movement set off by the Supreme Court, because they come from districts with small or relatively declining populations.

Mr. Helm, Mr. Haase, and Mr. Chappel are from rural areas that have been overrepresented in their legislatures. Mr. Hauser is from Hudson County, whose share of the New Jersey voters has been falling and which can therefore expect to lose seats in future reapportionment.

Mr. Wood, on the other hand, is from a growing Chicago suburb, and Mr. McCarty is from urban Oklahoma City.

The sponsors themselves say that their joint interest is only in the principle of States rights. Their committee report said there was now a "grave imbalance" of Federal power in this country, largely because of Supreme Court decisions.

A effort has been made to avoid the traditional association of the words "States rights" with a southern, racist viewpoint. Lieutenant Governor Chase of Kansas said:

"This is not a cotton picker's dream."

The same point was made by the committee's only paid employee, who is coordinating the drive. He is George Prentice, a 37-year-old former television newsman who now works for the Florida Legislature in Tallahassee.

"We have steered clear of the isms," Mr. Prentice said—"the citizens councils, that that kind of thing. We've done everything we can to get rid of the southern stigmatism. These guys sincerely believe in it as a matter of State independence."

Mr. Wood, in Plainfield, Ill., said he was for the movement because the 10th amendment, which reserves to the States and the people all power not granted to the Federal Government, had been "raped twice a day for 10 years."

IMPETUS FROM DECISION

All indications are that the real impetus for the amendment campaign has come from the Supreme Court's reapportionment decision. It has been hailed by many groups and on the whole has been regarded as popular with the people, but it has been criticized in some State legislatures and by rural and conservative forces.

Lieutenant Governor Chase said the decision had "stirred up a lot of mischief."

The committee's work has been so skillful that some opponents of the proposed amendments suspect the existence of a large professional organization behind it. They note, for example, that the resolutions have been drafted and presented in a form that in most States would not require approval by the Governor, who might well be more urban in outlook.

But Mr. Prentice says that in fact "it has been a very small thing, not a big-money proposition." He has simply sent letters to legislative leaders in the various States, he says, and made some telephone calls.

WHERE APPROVED

The States that have approved the apportionment amendment are Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming. The Utah resolution was in somewhat different language, and Mr. Prentice does not really count this as a success for the committee.

The proposal to give the States power to amend the Constitution has been passed in Arkansas, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Texas, and Wyoming. The "Court of the Union" has been approved in Arkansas, Florida, and Wyoming.

The proposals have gone through one house in a number of other State legislatures. The apportionment amendment has made that much progress in Colorado, Illinois, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, South Carolina, and Texas.

Mr. Prentice expects final approval shortly, by both houses, in New Jersey and Texas and in Alabama and Louisiana.

SURPRISING DEVELOPMENT

Perhaps most surprising is the success of the apportionment amendment in States with large urban, industrial populations, such as Missouri and New Jersey.

In New Jersey all 21 State Senators, 11 Republicans and 10 Democrats, sponsored the resolution, and it passed the senate unanimously along with the one to change the amendment process.

Observers say fear of reapportionment was the reason. The New Jersey Senate has one member for each county, an apportionment now under legal attack.

Even in the New Jersey Assembly, which is apportioned roughly on the basis of population, there has been little opposition. The only member to speak critically has been George C. Richardson of Newark, the Legislature's one Negro, who sees possible harm to civil rights efforts in the South.

"Nobody seems to care about the proposals," one New Jersey political observer remarks. He includes in that comment the State's Democratic Governor, Richard J. Hughes.

PREDICTS MORE OPPOSITION

Mr. Prentice expects more opposition to arise from liberal forces as more legislatures approve the amendments and the campaign therefore gets more public attention.

"You're probably going to have strong opposition from the Kennedy Administration," he said, "but there's been no open warfare yet."

In only two States has there been outspoken opposition from a powerful source. This was in Nebraska and Wisconsin, whose Democratic Governors spoke out.

Gov. Frank B. Morrison, of Nebraska, said the proposed amendment would weaken the Constitution. Under the procedure of Nebraska's unicameral legislature he can veto resolutions of this kind, and he did so.

Gov. John W. Reynolds of Wisconsin concentrated on the "Court of the Union" proposal, terming it "a last-ditch attempt on the part of frustrated southern segregationists to avoid the consequences of Supreme Court decisions forcing them to guarantee equal rights to all citizens."

---

[From the New York Times, May 2, 1963]

JUSTICE AID DECLARES "STATES RIGHTS" AMENDMENTS COULD COST NEGROES VOTE

(By Anthony Lewis)

WASHINGTON, May 1.—A Justice Department official warned today that a proposed constitutional amendment approved by 12 States could be used to disenfranchise Negroes.

Joseph F. Dolan, Assistant Deputy Attorney General, made the comment in a Law Day address. It was the first administration statement on three "States rights" amendments being pushed by the Council of State Governments.

One amendment would provide that nothing in the Constitution "shall restrict or limit any State in the apportionment of representation in its legislature." It would also take away the power of the Federal courts to hear cases on legislative districting.

"One State might choose to redistrict its legislature so that only real property owners might vote," Mr. Dolan said. "Another State might choose to take the right to vote away from the Negro."

Legal observers, considering this possibility, said the amendment might, for example, let the States gerrymander districts against Negroes. That is, districts could be drawn so that Negro voters could elect few or no representatives.

A few years ago the Alabama Legislature redrew the boundaries of the city of Tuskegee to exclude all Negro voters. The Supreme Court held this unconstitutional.

The proposed reapportionment amendment has been approved by the Legislatures of Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming. Utah has approved one in somewhat different language.

A second amendment would let the State legislatures amend the Constitution without any consideration by Congress, a convention, or any other national forum. Such national approval is now required.

Mr. Dolan called attention to a recent estimate that under this proposal, State legislators representing only 15 percent of the U.S. population could amend the Constitution. The estimate was made by Prof. Charles L. Black, Jr., in the current Yale Law Journal.

Approval by three-fourths of the States—38 of the present 50—is required to amend the Constitution. Professor Black notes that the 38 least populous States have 40 percent of the country's population.

Because of unequal districts, it is possible for 38 percent of each of these States' voters, on the average, to elect a majority in the more representative house of the legislature. Thus, the professor arrives at the figure of 15 percent—38 percent of 40 percent.

Mr. Dolan, whose remarks were addressed to a Law Day dinner of the Oneida County Bar Association in Utica, N.Y., said this amendment would allow change in the entire character of our system of government without any national consideration.

"The Presidency could be junked in favor of a troika," he said, "or the Congress abolished or radically altered, without any need for congressional approval."

This amendment has been approved by 10 States.

A third amendment would set up a Court of the Union, made up of the 50 State chief justices, to review Supreme Court decisions. Four legislatures have approved it.

Mr. Dolan noted that there has been little public discussion of any of these proposals. He said such fundamental changes should not be within the grasp of the States until the Nation has made a deliberate and considered decision.

Lawyers, Mr. Dolan said, have the primary obligation to inform the public in matters like this. He urged the bar to speak out.

---

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 20, 1963]

SPUTTERING PROTEST

Well, it appears that the State Righters' assault upon the Supreme Court in particular and upon the concept of expanding federalism in general has fallen somewhat short of becoming a prairie fire. Last December the National Legislative Conference Committee on Federal-State Relations asked all of the State legislatures to meet in January and petition Congress to amend the Federal Constitution in three important particulars. On the most popular of the proposed amendments, 11 States have responded, but the most radical of these proposed bombshells has proved to be almost a dud.

The first of the proposed "reform" measures would allow the States to initiate changes in the Constitution without the approval of Congress. Such an innovation would dangerously dilute the national interest in effecting constitutional changes. In effect it would give the States complete control over future amendments if three-fourths of them should choose to act in concert. But this proposal has been approved in only nine States in the South and the West. During the same period the anti-poll-tax amendment to the Constitution, which will further restrict States rights, has won 31 ratifications.

The second States rights "reform," which would reverse the Supreme Court's decision in the Tennessee reapportionment case and forbid the courts to intervene, regardless of how badly State legislatures might be gerrymandered, has been accepted by 11 States. Considering the jealousy with which the legislatures have guarded control over their own seats, this is a relatively mild protest against the legislative revolution that has followed the Tennessee decision. To date the third "reform," an absurd proposition designed to create a "Court of the Union" to overrule the Supreme Court when it decides questions involving the rights of the States, has won approval in only Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, and Wyoming.

It is shocking that any State would commend to Congress such a devastating assault upon our Federal system. But the resolutions that have been passed are only in the "hot air" stage. They have no standing as proposed amendments to the Constitution. It is difficult to believe that any of the four legislatures has seriously weighed the consequences of this Union-busting device. They and the sponors of this petition are airing grievances, which apparently have no widespread appeal. If they were making any headway with their campaign, the country would be in a perilous state indeed.

---

[From the New York Times, Friday, May 3, 1963]

THREE NONSENSICAL AMENDMENTS

Three proposed constitutional amendments advanced in the name of States rights had their best hope of success in silence. They have sailed through a number of legislatures with virtually no public notice. But now that more people are becoming informed on this campaign to revolutionize our form of government—revolutionize it back to a confederacy—its chances are, fortunately, growing dimmer.

One proposal provides that no provision of the Constitution shall restrict the power of the States to apportion their legislatures as they wish. This language would permit Southern legislatures to disfranchise Negroes by unrestrained gerrymandering and other devices. It would let other legislatures effectively limit the vote to farmers or to any special or favored group—without any constitutional restraint.

A second proposition is to let the State legislatures amend the Constitution in the future without the necessity of approval by Congress or any other national forum. It has been calculated that legislators representing a mere 15 percent of the population of the United States would then have the power to amend the Constitution for all of us. This would be possible because of the existing unfair districts in many State legislatures.

Finally, there is a proposal for a Court of the Union, composed of the 50 State chief justices, to review Supreme Court decisions. This is another preposterous idea—to set State judges, mostly elected and lacking the independence of life tenure, above the Justices of the highest Federal Court. It would be a long step backward to a confederacy.

These three nonsensical proposals have already passed too many legislatures for comfort. It is the duty of the organized bar to speak out against them. The leaders of both parties have a similar duty, for surely no responsible figure in government can think that the way to meet the problems of today is to retreat into the sectionalism of a bygone age.

---

[From the New Republic, May 4, 1963]

DISUNITED STATES

In a daft moment late last December, a bare majority of the Assembly of States of the usually responsible Council of State Governments voted to launch a campaign to break up the Federal Union. The assembly endorsed three proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution, the first of which would would permit two-thirds of the State legislators, acting separately, to propose amendments to the Federal Constitution directly to the States for ratification, thus bypassing both Congress and the national constitutional convention stipulated in the Constitution.

The second would forbid Federal courts to intervene in the apportionment of seats in State legislatures.

The third, and most amazing, would create, by constitutional amendment, a "Court of the Union" composed of the chief justices of the 50 State supreme courts. A majority of the sitting members of this "Court of the Union" could on its own motion, intervene and overthrow any U.S. Supreme Court decision considered an invasion of State's rights.

The backers of these amendments mean business. Identical texts, apparently disseminated from one source, are being adopted by State legislatures. If 34 legislatures should endorse any one of them, Congress would be confronted with the demand to call a national constitutional convention to consider submitting the proposal for ratification by three-fourths of the State legislatures.

In other words legislators representing less than 11 percent of the population could propose amendments, and these amendments would become law if ratified by representatives of less than 15 percent of the population. This is so because of unequal apportionment. Minorities elect majorities in State legislatures. For example, 27 percent of the population of New Mexico elects a majority in one house and 14 percent of the population elects a majority in the other. The legislatures of two-thirds of the States are controlled by 11.7 percent of the Nation's population.

Today, only some 5 months after the amendments were originally put forward, 10 State legislatures, or nearly one-third of the needed 34, have endorsed the proposal to prevent the Federal courts from intervening in apportionment of legislatures. Eight legislatures, or nearly one-fourth of those necessary, have in this short time endorsed the proposal that 34 legislatures acting independently and over a period of time, could compel the calling of a Federal constitutional convention to act upon an amendment submitted by them. And four legislatures—Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, and Wyoming—have endorsed the "Court of the Union."

---

[From the Chicago (Ill.) Daily News, May 6, 1963]

STATES TRYING TO CHANGE BASIC LAW OF THE UNITED STATES—DETAILS OF A THREE-POINT DRIVE TO CURB THE HIGHEST COURT

(By Robert L. Riggs)

WASHINGTON.—Those who are determined to force the Supreme Court to curtail what they call that body's law-writing activities have made such rapid and quiet progress in the last 4 months that defenders of the Tribunal are reacting in sudden and shocked amazement.

Almost unnoticed by bar associations and with virtually no national attention, a dozen legislatures have given final approval to a proposal which would enable States to amend the Constitution without having to get a vote in Congress.

An equal number of legislatures have given final approval to a proposed constitutional amendment which would blot out the Court's ruling a year ago which held that citizens dissatisfied with the apportionment of their legislative districts can sue for relief in Federal court.

A handful of legislatures have called for a change in the Constitution which would set up a "Court of the Union" with power to override decisions of the Supreme Court. The proposed new judicial body would have 50 members—the chief justices of the highest tribunals in each of the States.

The people who are sponsors of this three-part, curb-the-Court package hope that within the next few weeks a dozen more States will approve one or more of these efforts to amend the Constitution.

That would give them 24 and cause them to believe that when other legislatures assemble next January they could drive through to the 34 States needed to cause Congress to call a convention to consider changes in the Constitution.

REACTION SLOW, BUT IT'S SHARP

Although the reaction of the Court's defenders has been slow in coming, its sharpness indicates that proponents of the amendments will have to struggle harder for additional States than they did for the first dozen.

The strongest condemnation has come from Charles L. Black, Jr., professor at Yale Law School. In the April issue of the Yale Law Journal, Black concentrates his fire on the proposal to require Congress to submit to the States for ratification any amendment fostered by 34 legislatures.

Taking away from the Federal House and Senate their power to decide what to submit and what to withhold, Black argues, would be "one more attempt, so late in the day, to convert the United States into a confederation."

The Yale professor calls the proposed change in the method of amending the Constitution a threatened disaster, a dangerous proposal.

One of the few lawyer groups that has reacted against the assault on the Court is the Bar Association of St. Louis. In that city, where the fight for the Court has been taken up by Arthur J. Freund, the bar association denounced all three of the proposals.

But the Missouri Legislature gave final approval to 2 of them, the 1 to put the amending power in the hands of 34 legislatures and the 1 to overturn the ruling on apportionment of legislative districts.

Two reasons are advanced for the fact that little attention has been paid to the rapid spread of these anti-Court activities. One is that most legislatures are accustomed to having before them futile and offbeat proposals to amend the Constitution. It was easy to put these three in that category.

The second and more impressive reason is that the campaign is something of a family matter among legislators. The entire three-package proposal had its inception at a meeting of the Council of State Governments in Chicago last December.

ACTION IN SHADOW OF REMAP RULING

By rollcall votes of the States, that group put its prestige behind each of the three. The legislators' action at Chicago came just 6 months after the Court had held that Federal judges can take notice of the unfair drawing of the lines of their districts.

But while resentment against interference with their districts may have been a spur to members of the Council of State Governments, their votes showed them to be much more eager to get a constitutional provision putting the amending power in the hands of the legislatures than to override the apportionment decision.

On the question of this new way of amending the Constitution, representatives of 37 of the 50 States voted for adoption. Only 4 States opposed it. Four abstained because their spokesmen didn't know what their bodies back home thought of it. Five States were unrepresented.

By contrast, when it came to a vote on a proposed amendment to upset the Tennessee apportionment case, only 26 States voted "yes," 10 voted "no" and 10 abstained. Four were absent.

The third part of the package was approved by a margin of only one vote. Representatives of 21 States favored setting up the 50-judge Court of the Union to override the Supreme Court. Twenty opposed the plan, which had startled some of the most avid critics of the nine Justices. Five abstained and four were absent.

In fact, on the first count, the Court of the Union plan lost by 1 vote. But following a vigorous plea by Florida's former Gov. Millard Caldwell, it won adoption by the same 1-vote margin.

Although a Florida man saved it from defeat, the 50-judge supercourt is the pet project of a northern Republican, Warren Wood, 4 times speaker of the Illinois House of Representatives.

The sponsors of the three amendments have gone to great lengths to keep their campaign clear of southern coloration, clear of any connection with racial strife.

"DUAL SOVEREIGNTY" IS THE WATCHWORD

In none of their public arguments do the words "civil rights" or "States rights" appear. In place of "States rights," they talk about "dual sovereignty" and the need to stop the trend toward overactivity by the Federal Government.

To carry on the theme that this is not a Dixiecrat movement, the supporters of the amendments have placed their campaign in the hands of a committee composed largely of northerners. The title of the group is "The Volunteer Committee on Dual Sovereignty."

Its chairman is W. Stuart Helm, Republican speaker of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives. He also is president of the National Legislative Council.

Six vice chairmen are: Republican Warren Wood, of Illinois; Robert Hasse, Republican speaker of the assembly, Wisconsin's lower house; Republican Lt. Gov. Harold H. Chase, of Kansas; J. D. McCarty, Democratic speaker of the Oklahoma House; William V. Chappell, Jr., Democratic member and former speaker of the Florida House; and Frederick Hauser, Democratic member of the New Jersey House.

The committee's operations are in low key and apparently on a small budget, though there seems little question it can get such money as it needs as the occasion arises.

Its operations are directed from Tallahassee, Fla., by 37-year-old George R. Prentice, native of Kansas who has been a newspaperman in Birmingham and Little Rock.

Prentice, who operates a news bureau serving several television stations in Florida, is the only paid committee staff member with the exception of a couple of stenographers.

His main efforts have been neither to publicize the movement nor hide it, but to keep in touch with legislators of the various States who are pushing one or more of the three proposed amendments.

BIG INITIAL PUSH BY FLORIDIANS

During sessions of the Florida Legislature, Prentice works for Speaker Mallory Horne. It was through his previous employment with former Speaker Chappell that Prentice got involved in the project. Although the northern legislators now are in front of the campaign, much of the steam for the amendments came from Chappell and others in Florida.

One of Prentice's tasks is to see that the committee avoids undesirable companions. While he recognizes that anyone who wants to do so can join the cheering section, he tries to keep the working ranks cleared of members of the John Birch Society, the racist White Citizens Council or any other groups on the radical right.

As a matter of tactics, there is no need for the committee to rally anticourt sentiment in the South. There is enough bitterness in that section over school desegregation.

Hence, the committee has more to gain by seeking Northern support on a straight-out conservative economic argument—especially since some of its Northern friends have to compete with Democrats for Negro votes.

The desire to keep the movement clear of the white supremacy issue may account for the action of the Mississippi Legislature in rejecting all three of the proposed amendments. Certainly, no State has more outspoken critics of the Supreme Court than has Mississippi.

One explanation offered for the Mississippi rejection was that legislative leaders didn't want to bring up the matter so soon after the bloodshed at the University of Mississippi.

Maryland turned down all three proposals. Massachusetts abstained from voting at Chicago. But when John E. Powers, president of the senate, got back to Boston, he took the position that the three ought to be submitted and killed. As a result the proposed Court of the Union was rejected and the other two died in committee.

GOVERNOR VETOED BILLS IN NEBRASKA

Nebraska had a unique record. Its one-house legislature approved the amendment to let States control changes in the Constitution and to set aside the Tennessee reapportionment decision. But the Democractic Governor vetoed the action.

Missouri, which approved two of the proposals, rejected the Court of the Union idea.

There are 13 States in which the legistures have given final approval to at least 1 of the 3 proposals—14 if you count Nebraska.

The 13 are: Arkansas, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Texas, Washington and Wyoming.

The total would rise to 15 if Utah and Nebraska were added. Utah approved the one about changing the Constitution and the one upsetting the apportionment decision. But because they are not worded exactly as are the ones approved in other States, there is some question whether Congress would have to accept the Utah resolution.

The 12 States where the dual sovereignty committee hopes to have more successes this year, but where stronger resistance is expected are: South Carolina, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Alabama, Louisiana, Wisconsin, Michigan and Vermont. In Wisconsin, once the "test tube" of the LaFollette Progressive movement, the lower house gave its approval to the 50-man super court and to the proposal to let State legislatures control constitutional amendments.

Although the sponsors of the three constitutional changes steer clear of any mention of the school integration decision of 1954 or other civil rights issues, they do not hesitate to point out some of the economic questions on which they believe the Supreme Court has "legislated" through its decisions.

LIST WAYS COURT CENTRALIZES POWER

They do not say that if the States get more power to amend the Constitution without veto from Congress that they will wipe out any of the decisions. But they do list the following as examples of decisions by which the Supreme Court gave the Federal Government more power: Unemployment insurance, with employers providing funds; old-age pensions taxing both employer and employee; regulation of labor relations; regulation of tobacco grading; minimum wages and maximum hours; workers required to join unions in order to hold jobs; employers required to negotiate with unions; States forbidden to prosecute for sedition because the Federal Government has preempted that field; States forbidden to discharge schoolteachers who use the fifth amendment to keep from answering questions about Communist actively; and permitting Federal judges to hear suits over apportionment of districts for State legislatures.

In his denunciation of the dual sovereignty committee's campaign, Yale's Professor Black brushes aside the proposal for a 50-man supercourt as "so patently absurd," that it will sink without trace.

His judgment seems to be upheld by the reluctance of legislatures to approve it and by the one-vote margin which carried it in Chicago.

As to the proposal to set aside the Tennessee reapportionment decision, Black's position is that that is a special subject and its adoption, whether wise or unwise, would not "affect the Federal power or the whole shape of the Union."

Such is not the case with the plan to let 34 States dictate the submission of a constitutional amendment without congressional vote. The adoption of that proposal would, said Black, "effect a constitutional change of higher order of importance than any since 1787—if one excepts the de facto change implicit in the result of the Civil War."

That constitutional amendment, Black said, would permit a proportion of the American people no greater than that which voted for Landon in 1936 to impose upon the rest of the country any alteration whatever in the Constitution.

The alteration could be brought about by people who reside in "overrepresented legislative districts. The amendment would let the legislatures of 34 of the least populous States, containing less than 40 percent of the national population, change the Constitution.

BIG CHANGES—IF 15 PERCENT WANT THEM

Because even those people aren't properly represented in their legislatures, Black said, 15 percent of the Nation's population could do such things as repeal the income tax, change the Presidency to a Committee of Three, hobble the treatymaking power of the Chief Executive through such devices as the Bricker amendment, make Federal judges elective, make Catholics ineligible for office and move the Capital to Topeka.

The present provisions of article V, the amending article, Black said, provide for a national debate on proposals to change the Constitution. That is because the proposed change has to be approved by the national House and Senate before being submitted to the States for ratification.

But under the committee's plan, all debate on constitutional changes would take place in State capitals without seeking a "national consensus."

The only role Congress would play in the amending procedure would be that of sending the proposed change back to the States for ratification after 34 States has presented it.

The Court of the Union, which seems to have so little chance, would be a 50-member body, with a chief justice from each high State court. It would go into action only if five States, which do not border each other, make complaint against a Supreme Court decision within 2 years after it is handed down.

The restriction against action by neighboring States is presumed to be for the purpose of discouraging sectional action.

Three-fourths of the 50 judges would constitute a court quorum. But in order to set aside a decision of the Supreme Court, 26 of the State judges would have to agree. Its chief function would be to decide whether or not the Constitution actually gave the Supreme Court jurisdiction to make the ruling to which five States had objected.

The proposed amendment would require that Congress house the new court and provide money for its operation.

---

[From the Chicago Daily News, May 6, 1963]

MANEUVER FOR ORAL ROLLCALL SUCCESSFUL—HOW WOOD GOT PROPOSAL THROUGH THE HOUSE

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—On a miserable, rainy, windy, and cold evening in Springfield, there came bounding down the steps of the State Capitol a man whose obvious high spirits seemed completely untouched by the dampness.

"I'm going to celebrate," chortled silver-haired State Representative Warren Wood, Republican, of Plainfield, four-time Speaker of the House.

Wood, by shrewd political maneuving that day, March 5, 1963, had pushed through the House by a 1-vote margin his controversial States rights proposal which would enable State legislatures to bypass Congress in amending the Constitution.

Fearing a possible countermove by Democrats to reconsider the vote, Wood had gone back to the speaker of the House's office, to make sure the resolution was mailed off to Washington.

Both parties had fought roughly over the resolution. Democrats were out to kill it. There were unconfirmed reports that orders to do so had come from the White House.

The resolution had won approval in the heavily Republican Senate the previous month, and was sent to the House on Valentine's Day. Five days later, Wood made his first attempt to pass it.

He was winning by a vote of 84 to 83 on the red and green electrical rollcall board when Democrats issued "or else" orders to Representative Carl H. Wittmond, Democrat, of Brussels, to change his vote from "aye" to "no."

This would have switched the score to 84 to 83 against the resolution and it would have died.

Wood asked and received postponement of consideration.

Wood then regrouped his forces and waited. On March 5 he was ready. He proposed an unusual tactic—an oral rollcall rather than voting on the electrical scoreboard. He hoped it would confuse Democrats.

Wood had a comfortable lead until Democrats, led by Representative Paul Elward (Democrat, of Chicago), demanded verification of votes in order to smoke out Democrats who sided in principle with Wood and were going to show it by not voting.

Wood's comfortable margin began to diminish. These Democrats were whipped into line: Dave Glenn, of Greenup, Allen Lucas, of Springfield, Leo Pfeffer, of Seymour, Sam Homano, of Chicago and Wittmond.

Two sometime Republicans, Peter J. Miller and Walter (Babe) McAvoy, both of Chicago, took a walk and did not vote.

Representative Robert Craig, of Indiaola, the only Democrat who had voted for the resolution when it was first considered, also took a walk.

It was Wood's maneuver for an oral rollcall that saved the day for him. Startled Democrats worked hard to pin down nonvoters, but their tally was bad.

Representative Paul Ceasar, Democrat, of Chicago, didn't vote, but Elward and Representative John Touhy, Chicago, Democratic whip who helped in the roundup, did not realize this in time. If Ceasar had voted, the count would have stood at 81 to 81, and the resolution would have died.

A spectator watching the Wood victory said, "It did my rightwing heart good."

Negro lawmakers in both parties voted against the resolution, arguing that it would be a boon to the segregated South and a slap at the U.S. Supreme Court for its civil rights decisions on integration.

Wood denied this, arguing that he only wanted to preserve "dual sovereignty."

"The official motto of Illinois is 'National Union and State Sovereignty,'" he said. "If we can't retain the American system of dual sovereignty, then all power is going to wind up in Washington."

Two other Wood resolutions aimed at curbing the alleged invasion of States' rights by the U.S. Supreme Court are pending in the house. These are proposals for a Court of the Union—the supercourt that could overrule the Supreme Court—and an amendment that would prevent Federal intervention in reapportionment of State legislatures.

The latter has passed the Senate, where Republicans are in control.

---

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

---

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment:

H.R. 5207. An act to amend the Foreign Service Buildings Act, 1926, to authorize additional appropriations, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 178).

---

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. BIBLE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Edmond T. Daly, of the District of Columbia, to be associate judge of the District of Columbia court of general sessions;

Orman W. Ketcham, of Maryland, to be associate judge of the juvenile court of the District of Columbia; and Richard R. Atkinson, for reappointment as a member of the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency.

---

ADDITIONAL BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. MONRONEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (S. 1546) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease certain deposits of minerals in the bed of the Red River in Oklahoma, which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

(See the remarks of Mr. MONRONEY when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

---

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF A JOINT COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS

Mr. HUMPHREY submitted a concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 42) establishing the Joint Committee on National Security Affairs, which, by unanimous consent, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See the above concurrent resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. HUMPHREY, which appears under a separate heading.)

---

RESOLUTION

STUDY TO DETERMINE WHETHER THE HOLDING BY A MEMBER OF THE SENATE OF A COMMISSION AS A RESERVE MEMBER OF ANY OF THE ARMED FORCES IS INCOMPATIBLE WITH HIS OFFICE AS SENATOR

Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Mr. THURMOND) submitted a resolution

(S. Res. 142) to make inquiry whether the holding by a Member of the Senate of a Commission as a Reserve member of any of the Armed Forces is incompatible with his office as Senator, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the above resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. GOLDWATER, which appears under a separate heading.)

LEASE OF CERTAIN DEPOSITS OF MINERALS IN BED OF RED RIVER, OKLAHOMA

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease certain deposits of minerals in the bed of the Red River in Oklahoma.

The purpose of this act is to clarify the status of the bed of the Red River in relation to the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, as amended and supplemented, including but not limited to, the act of August 7, 1947.

In 1890, the territory that is now Oklahoma was officially designated to be agricultural land. The Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, which gave the Secretary of the Interior the authority to lease Federal land under certain conditions, did not include such land previously designated as agricultural, according to a Supreme Court case in 1922.

There has been considerable litigation since 1922 involving the bed of the Red River. However, the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to execute leases under the Mineral Leasing Act has not been made clear.

This bill would merely clarify that the bed of the Red River from the 98th meridian west to the Texas border, approximately two-fifths of the southern Oklahoma-Texas border, is under the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920 as amended and supplemented, allowing the Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to the provisions of the Mineral Leasing Act, to lease portions of the bed of the Red River to private persons or corporations on the basis of competitive bidding.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1546) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease certain deposits of minerals in the bed of the Red River in Oklahoma, introduced by Mr. MONRONEY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), as amended and supplemented, including without limitation the Act of August 7, 1947 (61 Stat. 913), is extended to deposits of minerals that are subject to the Mineral Leasing Act as heretofore or hereafter amended or supplemented, which deposits are owned by the United States and are located in the part of the bed of the Red River which lies west of the 98th meridian in the State of Oklahoma.

SEC. 2. This Act shall not apply to any deposits of minerals held by the United States in trust for Indians.

NEED FOR A JOINT COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I submit, and send to the desk, for appropriate reference, a concurrent resolution calling for the establishment of a Joint Committee on National Security Affairs. I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the proposed joint committee would be empowered "to make a continuous study and investigation of all matters pertaining to national defense, foreign policy, and national security"—including, under this last term, the areas of "intelligence"—the Central Intelligence Agency—"defense policy, nuclear development, and disarmament."

Let me make clear at the outset that the proposed joint committee, although drawing on the membership and the talent of several standing committees in both Houses of Congress, would in no way infringe on the legislative responsibilities or the jurisdiction of these or any other standing committees. My proposal is to create in the legislative branch a committee which would be the counterpart—in terms of its comprehensive interests—of the National Security Council in the executive branch. Its formal authority, like that of the Joint Economic Committee, would be consultative only. But I hope it would provide the type of comprehensive and inclusive analysis of national security policy that the Joint Economic Committee provides in the field of economics and government.

The Joint Committee on National Security Affairs would not have legislative responsibilities infringing on the prerogatives of its parent committees—the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, the respective Committees on Armed Services, and the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. By providing the type of comprehensive review of all facets of national security policy, the joint committee would assist these standing legislative committees in reaching the type of informed and independent judgments that can only strengthen their respective roles in the formulation of national security policy.

Mr. President, there is a clear need for a committee representing the House and Senate and both political parties to advise the Congress and the executive departments on the broad questions of national security and to make specific recommendations to the appropriate standing committees. If Congress desires to remain a respected and effective participant in the process of formulating such policy, we must begin to approach these matters in the same comprehensive fashion that the executive branch does.

Such questions as international relations, defense policy, intelligence activities, nuclear development, arms control and disarmament, foreign assistance, and weapons development are closely interrelated means whereby the United States seeks to achieve specific national security ends. For example, we should never fall into the trap of considering weapons and nuclear development as policies opposed to those for achieving arms control and disarmament. Each one represents a particular facet of the total policy designed ultimately to protect the national security of this country in the most effective manner. Arbitrarily to consider each facet without reference to other related areas of national security policy is to weaken dangerously the ability of Congress to assume a forceful and responsible role in the formulation of the policies themselves.

A Joint Committee on National Security Affairs certainly is no panacea for our problems. Structural innovations alone will not solve any basic flaws in our judgment of these critical decisions or our determination to see them through to a successful conclusion. But given the fundamental health of American democracy, which is incontestable, it seems imperative that the Congress have the machinery to translate this asset into smoothly formulated, effective policies. A Joint Committee on National Security Affairs could be an important nonpartisan step in this direction. Properly conceived and properly implemented, it would contribute to an integrated approach to problems which strain to the limits the present committee structure.

An important function of the proposed joint committee is that of congressional surveillance and coordination of the intelligence agencies and instrumentalities of the executive branch. It could serve as the watchdog committee of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The members of the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committees, the Armed Services Committees, and the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy would bring a wealth of information and a definite perspective to the work of the Joint Committee on National Security Affairs. I believe we should provide a forum whereby these respective experiences and backgrounds can be used constructively in the analysis and formation of policy. Lacking this central forum, it is often difficult for the members of these respective committees to engage in such constructive and cooperative enterprises. It is quite natural and desirable that the Armed Services Committee should view questions of force levels and weapons development from a different perspective than does the Foreign Relations Committee. The Joint Atomic Energy Committee considers a proposed test-ban treaty in terms of technical and scientific problems; the Foreign Relations Committee tends to consider such a treaty from the standpoint of the basic diplomatic posture of the United States. Each perspective is valid; each contribution is needed.

But at some juncture in the consideration of these and similar questions, Congress should have the means to attempt to reach an integrated opinion that

IN HIGH COURT—A BLANKET RULE AGAINST SEGREGATION?

Supreme Court

Big question after the latest round of Supreme Court rulings on race issues: What next?

Private businesses and private clubs wonder if the day is approaching when the federal courts will dictate racial policies for them, too.

Negroes, once again, have won a big victory in the U. S. Supreme Court.

The Court, on May 20, threw out the convictions of Negroes and white sympathizers arrested for "sit-in" demonstrations against segregation in business places in the South.

Negro leaders immediately announced that the rulings will bring an increase of sit-ins all over the country.

Businessmen, everywhere, were left wondering what comes next.

Can any businessman, anywhere, effectively refuse to serve Negroes?

The Court deferred decision on a Maryland case involving that issue.

Pattern of decisions. By one decision after another, however, the Court has established a pattern of ruling against almost any form of racial discrimination.

Segregation has been outlawed in public schools, interstate-transportation facilities, public parks or playgrounds, and in public housing. Now the issue involves businesses that are privately owned.

What the Supreme Court ruled in six decisions on May 20 was this:

- Negroes cannot be convicted of trespass for demanding service in a "whites only" restaurant where there is a law that requires segregation.
- Even where there is no such law, convictions cannot stand if officials are carrying out a public policy of racial segregation.

What the Court held, in effect, was that it is unconstitutional for a State or community to require racial segregation, and therefore police power cannot be used to enforce such segregation.

All the cases involved in those rulings came from Southern States—South Carolina, Alabama, North Carolina and Louisiana—where segregation is an established public policy.

The "right to restrict." Still to be clarified is the legal situation in the case of a businessman who bars Negroes on his own, without compulsion of law or official policy.

Associate Justice John M. Harlan, the only dissenter to the May 20 decisions, declared:

"An individual's right to restrict the use of his property, however unregenerate a particular exercise of that right may be thought, lies beyond the reach of the Fourteenth Amendment."

However, Chief Justice Earl Warren, who wrote the majority opinions, took the position that private discrimination becomes unconstitutional when government becomes involved in it "to some significant extent."

Associate Justice William O. Douglas, in a concurring opinion, went further. He said: "When the doors of a business are open to the public, they must be open to all regardless of race. . . ."

A case touching on this point is before the Supreme Court. It is an appeal by Negroes fined on trespass charges after refusing to leave a privately owned amusement park in Glen Echo, Md., just outside Washington, D. C.

The Court has ordered this case reargued—indicating that it has not yet been able to make up its mind.

A question of "licenses." Justice Douglas also raised another question that is causing concern among businessmen about what the High Court may hold in the future. He pointed out that restaurants are licensed to do business, and said he sees "no constitutional way" for a Government to license a business to practice discrimination.

Many types of business operate under a license by some government. So do many private clubs. This is being asked:

Is the Supreme Court working toward a blanket ban against racial discrimination—private, as well as public?

TROOPS . . . MARCHERS . . . FULL JAILS—RACE TENSION SPREADS

During the week ending May 24:

MONTGOMERY, Ala. – A new showdown between State and federal power began developing.

The University of Alabama has been ordered by a U. S. court to admit two Negroes on June 10.

Governor George Wallace served notice on May 21 that he personally will bar their entrance.

President John Kennedy, on May 22, made it plain that he will send federal troops if necessary to enforce the court's order—just as he did last September, when Negro James Meredith entered the University of Mississippi. Then, on May 24, the U. S. Department of Justice asked a federal-court injunction to bar Governor Wallace from interfering at Alabama U.

GREENSBORO, N. C.—Highway patrolmen moved in after two weeks of mass marches by thousands of Negroes demanding integration.

Arrests, mounting above 1,500, overcrowded the city's jails.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. – Two developments raised hopes for racial peace in this long-troubled city.

A U. S. court forbade expulsion of 1,000 Negro school youngsters who took part in demonstrations. Negroes had threatened new demonstrations if the pupils were expelled.

A State supreme court ruling removed Birmingham's city commission that had antagonized Negroes. The new city government is considered more moderate on racial issues.

JACKSON, Miss. – The State attorney general's office sued in a U. S. court to remove U. S. troops guarding Negro James Meredith at the University of Mississippi.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—President Kennedy, in the face of spreading race troubles, said he is considering new civil-rights legislation.

Commentary
Sept. 1963
Supreme Court

JUSTICE BLACK AND THE ABSOLUTE

James Grossman

"DUE PROCESS, to use the vernacular," Justice Douglas has said in a formal lecture on the Bill of Rights, "is the wild card that can be put to such use as the judges choose." A little more than a quarter of a century ago they chose, in the name of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,* to strike down statutes that were intended to help us out of the Depression. One had the sense of an accelerating force out of control by the spring of 1936. On each of three successive Mondays the Supreme Court declared a statute unconstitutional, using for each a different reason and reserving due process for the last, a New York minimum wage law for women drawn with such care to appease the Court that even starvation wages were to be raised only if a reasonable wage level resulted.

Today the use of the due process clause to upset any economic regulation seems impossible. We know the exact moment when the new direction set in. Less than a year after the decision in the New York case a Washington State minimum wage act, much less well-drawn than the one in New York, was upheld. No new judge had considered the problem, no new learning was brought to it; between the two decisions Franklin Roosevelt had been overwhelmingly re-elected and proposed to pack the Court with new judges. It seems an unimportant nicety to point out that the Washington case apparently had already been informally decided before Roosevelt's plan was announced. As the attack continued, the Court by the changed vote of one judge or at the most two ("A switch in time saves nine") found that the power to enact broad welfare legislation existed in Congress as well as the states, and at a well-timed moment in the fight one extremely conservative judge retired. The Court-packing plan was beaten and the independence of the judiciary preserved by surrendering to the assailant.

To fill the vacancy Roosevelt appointed Senator Hugo Black, an outright New Dealer, which to Roosevelt's opponents implied some unfitness to be a judge, as if it were unseemly to uphold the New Deal on the basis of a conviction older and deeper than the newly converted majority's. A more serious question was raised when the nation learned, too late to do anything about it, that Black for a few years in the 20's had been a member of the Ku Klux Klan in Alabama, a fact well known there but apparently denied in the Senate during the debate on confirmation. A white-robed Klansman among the black-robed judges—a doctored photograph in the newspapers made this newspaper rhetoric vivid and literal—was at the moment an overwhelming national scandal, which seen today in perspective seems irrelevant.

* The relevant passage of the Fourteenth Amendment is the second sentence of Section 1: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The brief membership, which if timely revealed might have prevented his Supreme Court career, has to be considered in the light not only of that career but also of his earlier career, which he may have been too proud to discuss when he made his unhappy radio address to the nation, for both careers are of a piece. A few years ago Justice Black wrote at length to demonstrate that no crime was committed by one lone Negro's dancing quietly by himself while waiting for a bus and that to convict him of loitering for this and of disorderly conduct for arguing with the policeman who arrested him denied him due process of law. Fifty years ago as a young police court judge in Birmingham, Black in dismissing a disorderly conduct charge against twenty-two Negroes arrested at a dance told the arresting officer that he had no more right to break up their dance than any other. The Supreme Court judge who has so vigorously opposed the lawless enforcement of the law opposed it with equal vigor when he was a county prosecutor in 1915. Negroes arrested and held indefinitely, to increase the fees of their keepers and the costs that prisoners had to pay until they were tried, were either brought to trial quickly by Black or had their cases dismissed. A high percentage of confessions by the Negroes of a certain locality made him suspicious of the police there; on discovering that for a long time they had been using brutal torture he had a grand jury investigate, prepared an eloquent report that led to an independent citizens' committee inquiry and the proposal to oust the guilty policemen. Characteristically, his report insisted that an arrested man, whether innocent or guilty, did not give up his "right to be treated as a human being. . . ."

Joining the Supreme Court while it was in a more or less graceful retreat from its constitutional excesses, Black wanted it in effect to admit clearly and forthwith that it was wrong about the Fourteenth Amendment and had been wrong for decades. Ideally, rate cases brought by utilities claiming that the state had set confiscatory rates should be neither affirmed nor reversed on their merits but dismissed to show that they were not even within the Court's jurisdiction. Corporations, which brought most of the litigation under the Fourteenth Amendment, should be told that a human being was the only kind of "person" whom the Framers of the Amendment had in mind. Black was right in distrusting Roscoe Conkling's plea on behalf of a railroad client in the 1880's that the Framers—he had been one of them—shifted from "citizens" to "person" for the very purpose of using a word broad enough to cover both Negroes and corporations. Conkling fudged his facts; there seems to have been no conscious conspiracy for business such as he implied existed. But scholars have made the point that we should not, as Black does, stop here. The Framers, or some of them, were good enough lawyers to know that "due process" was growing beyond its original meaning to take in on the one hand such spiritual concerns as freedom of speech and on the other such practical ones as business and corporations; and if the Framers could think of corporations as entitled to due process, they could also easily think of them as persons.

Black has never convinced the Court on his tactical point about corporations. (He himself has ignored it in rescuing a newspaper corporation from punishment for an editorial.) But he has apparently established his major point, that due process has nothing to do with state regulation of business. The victory was won in the 40's but has just been restated formally by Black. This past term the Court has sustained a state statute prohibiting the general practice of debt adjustment, the business of taking control of a hard-pressed debtor's funds and trying to settle with his creditors. It might well be deemed a harmful business, subject to abuse; but what Black said in his majority opinion was that the state could act foolishly or wisely, under one economic theory or another, it was no concern of the Court's either to approve or disapprove. Only the most conservative of the judges felt the need to assert that the statute might actually be rational; all the other members of an individualistic court given to the exact expression of their views were silent.

Due process of law, whatever else it covers, has always signified to the Court, just as it does to laymen, procedural safeguards. What they are, the Court has never told us precisely. Those that have been enumerated by it come chiefly from the Bill of Rights. As the Bill of Rights was adopted to bind only the federal government and not the states, the Court in construing the Fourteenth Amendment has felt free to pick and choose among the rights; only fundamental ones—those "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty," essential to "civilized decency," to "fundamental liberty and justice"—have been absorbed into due process. By this method self-incrimination and double jeopardy have apparently not been absorbed, certainly not fully, indictment by grand jury not at all, but unreasonable searches and seizures and right to counsel have been. The First Amendment rights—freedom of religion, press, assembly, petition, although matters of substance rather than of procedure—seem to have been fully carried over into due process.

No one in our time has so pushed the Court to make the Bill of Rights applicable to the states or to expand the provisions of the Bill of Rights itself as has Hugo Black. His passion for freedom, his faith in it as an everyday guide stand out in Irving Dilliard's excellent collection of Black's opinions on civil rights and liberties.* By arranging them chronologically and including Black's James Madison Lecture as well as his public interview on absolutes at an American Jewish Congress dinner, Mr. Dilliard has enabled us to see Black's philosophy of freedom emerging fully articulated relatively early, and yet having even now the potentiality of startling consequences.

THE MAJORITY of the Court, particularly when influenced by Felix Frankfurter, has been haunted by the possibility that it may now, in the field of civil rights, be imposing its own views of freedom, its very prejudices, on legislatures, as formerly its predecessors imposed theirs in the field of economics. It is a troublesome doubt, for all who judge like to believe that they are governed by objective standards; even literary critics are reluctant to accept Remy de Gourmont's view that it is the function of the critic to erect his prejudices into laws. For a profound student of the Court like Frankfurter, aware of past abuse of judicial power, the only hope is in self-restraint, humility. "Mr. Justice Frankfurter is deeply humilitarian," Professor Wallace Mendelson has observed. "Plainly this is an acquired characteristic. . . ."

For Black, the Frankfurter technique leads not only to uncertainty but to the very vice it purports to cure. No matter how one words the standards judges should apply, the actual method of selecting what is essential to due process is bound to be personal; the greater the judges' self-restraint the more they are legislating and in the end nullifying the Bill of Rights. It is implicit in Black's logic that all of the provisions of the Bill must be treated as part of due process, and he believes that what logic demands history has happily performed: the entire Bill of Rights was incorporated (presumably through the privileges and immunities clause) into the Fourteenth Amendment by its Framers.

In an elaborate appendix to a 1947 dissenting opinion, Black made what may well be the fullest investigation into the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment that has been made by a Supreme Court judge, for judges usually do not look so much to history as to what their predecessors have said is history. He found that Congressman Bingham, whom Black likes to call the Madison of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, mentioned the Bill of Rights frequently in debate, and that Howard of Michigan in introducing the Amendment in the Senate clearly stated that it protected the personal rights set forth in the first eight Amendments. These views of a proponent are entitled, it seems to me, to a greater weight than is usually accorded them, and yet as Frankfurter said, "What was submitted for ratification was his proposal not his speech." The proposal was so unclear that state legislatures do not seem to have been aware that it was being made; nearly half of the ratifying states were then instituting criminal prosecutions without a grand jury and never changed so as to conform to this requirement of the Bill of Rights. Most of the public discussion of the Fourteenth Amendment was about its major purpose, the protection of Negroes and the reconstruction of the South. In this clamor little else could be heard. If Black is right, it can almost be said that the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted by a conspiracy—one, however, not on behalf of corporate power but of the Bill of Rights.

Black's doctrine of wholesale incorporation has not been accepted by the Court, but I believe that it has influenced decisions. There seems to be a recent tendency to apply all of the features of a right enumerated in the Bill in their full rigor against a state when the right is found to be part of due process. We saw how absolute a prohibition can be when Black demonstrated that New York's experiment with a vaguely deistic prayer of less than two dozen words was an establishment of officially approved religious doctrine forbidden by the First Amendment.

Professor Edmond Cahn in his public interview of Black used as a text the sentence from the James Madison Lecture that might be taken as the judge's credo: "It is my belief that there are 'absolutes' in our Bill of Rights, and that they were put there on purpose by men who knew what words meant and meant their prohibitions to be 'absolutes.'" We can agree with Black's characteristic argument from history in every field except the one that is most important, freedom of the press.

An excellent case has been made by a liberal scholar that the Framers' bold words on freedom of the press when the First Amendment was adopted meant much less to them then than they do to us now.† That freedom was placed beyond the reach of the government; Congress, unlike the Parliament in England, could not abridge it in the slightest. But what was given this absolute protection was a relatively narrow freedom, the right to publish without previous restraint or licensing such as had prevailed in England until 1694; one would still be subject to prosecution for seditious libel, as fairly moderate disparagement of the government was called. The most that the Framers seem to have had in mind was the right to plead truth as a defense and to have it passed on by a jury. It was only when Madison and Jefferson and their allies were fighting the Sedition Act aimed against their party that they first urged that a broader definition of freedom was embodied in the First Amendment. They may not have been absolutely and impartially committed to this new contention, for in Jefferson's administration some men were indicted for a seditious libel on him and his Congress, and the indictment was pending in Madison's administration until dismissed by the Supreme Court, not as an invasion of freedom of the press but because there could only be statutory and not common law federal crimes.

---

* One Man's Stand for Freedom: Mr. Justice Black and the Bill of Rights, Knopf, 504 pp., $6.95.

† Legacy of Suppression: Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History, by Leonard W. Levy, Belknap Press, 353 pp., $6.50.

Jefferson's and Madison's more liberal views have prevailed to such an extent that we are likely to think that their own dabbling in seditious libel was not in good faith. We should realize rather that they and their allies in the course of their political struggles enlarged constitutional freedom. What Professor Levy has said so well of them has some application to Justice Black today. "They were addressing the future, not the past. Their insistence that they were simply clarifying the past's original understanding reflected an Anglo-American habit of going forward while facing backwards: rights that should exist are established on the fictitious pretense that they have ever existed. . . ." It is a noble fiction that when sincerely believed can help create for the future the Golden Age it sees in the past. But it is a future that has not yet come into being.

The views which Black holds with such intensity he seems to have enjoyed stating in his New York interview with provocative simplicity, as if he were speaking off the cuff rather than from his depth of historical learning. But the very casualness with which he asserts his claims for the absolute can jolt us into realizing that we have been accepting, merely because they are old, restrictions on freedom that are inconsistent with it. His most startling, most shocking, theory is the unconstitutionality of our libel law. That Congress has enacted no law on private libel in its entire existence may well be a sign that, as early commentators thought, it cannot under the First Amendment. What is forbidden Congress seems equally to be forbidden the states (even if we think of only the First Amendment and not the entire Bill of Rights as being made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth). This is in essence Black's point. But if we infer nothing from the inaction of Congress and if we assume, as I believe we must, that freedom is less than absolute, still many of the peculiar features of present libel law must go if freedom of the press is to have any real meaning.

Freedom, we like to say, does not give one the right to harm others by lying about them. But the law of libel—which derives largely from Star Chamber, that part of the English tradition least compatible with freedom—in a number of ways goes much farther than to give compensation for actual damage from lies:

(1) The plaintiff does not have to prove that what has been written about him is false. Instead, the burden of proving truth is on the defendant and he is limited to the use of legally acceptable evidence, which often means that he must produce in court the eyewitnesses to the events he has written about. It is not enough for him to show that he has acted with the greatest care and has used only reliable sources; he will still be liable, for this is one field of law in which there can be liability without fault in anyone, unless we accept the Star Chamber view that unlicensed writing is itself a fault.

(2) Punitive damages, a frankly penal sum in excess of actual damage, can be awarded if the defendant acted maliciously, which may mean no more than that in a jury's opinion he did. So much of the ancient hostility to the press survives in our libel law that if a defendant pleads the defense of truth and fails to establish it, his failure is a circumstance from which the jury may infer malice. Punitive damages paid to the plaintiff are possibly an even more oppressive form of punishment than a fine paid to the state would be. They are a criminal sanction imposed without the traditional safeguards of the criminal law. The jury in many states need not be unanimous in its verdict, nor need it find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

(3) Even a verdict nominally limited to plaintiff's actual damages can in reality include a penal amount. For the plaintiff need not offer any evidence of the damage he has suffered; the jury can infer the amount from the circumstances of the case.

The judge-made rule of judicial impunity recognizes the deterrent effect of libel suits. If what a judge says or writes in a case is relevant, it can be false, scurrilous, malicious, but the judge cannot be held liable. Surely the basis for this rule is not that judges demand the right to defame, but that they need this absolute freedom of speech if they are to speak freely.

A wholesome dread of the law's uncertainties, a wholesome ignorance of how really illiberal the law of libel is, perhaps explain why more damage to freedom has not been done by it. The huge verdicts of the last few years give to the law a new potential for harm, particularly in areas in which a pattern of repetition may be established. A scandal sheet, living by defamation, changing its victims constantly, presumably can pay the cost. A Northern newspaper or magazine circulating in the South may find it prohibitively expensive to publish the truth as it sees it or to advertise the political views of others if Southern juries are to continue to bring in half-million dollar verdicts. In a normal world a balance of rights—an approach that Black despises—would suggest that where a subject of public importance is involved a plaintiff should recover in a libel suit only if he proves that the statement about him was false and the defendant careless or otherwise at fault, and his recovery should be limited to the actual damages established by competent evidence. If abnormal verdicts persist, the temptation may become strong to find that the First Amendment has to be read as literally as Black says it should be.*

BLACK SPEAKS in terms of absolutes, but when we compare the actual issues in a case with Black's opinion—Irving Dilliard's valuable prefatory notes and his skillful editing of the opinions make it easy for us to do this—we are struck by how much stronger the doctrine often is than the occasion actually demands. If freedom wins, he writes to assure it the largest victory. If he is in dissent but also at times when he concurs, the wrong to freedom reminds him of the grossest ancient wrongs—the anti-Masonic madness of the 1830's, the Alien and Sedition laws, Protestant persecution of Catholics, Catholic attainder of Protestants (Black follows Macaulay in his views of the wickedness of James II's brief ascendancy in Ireland, not Lecky, who finds Macaulay's picturesque, horrifying details exaggerations). In the long run Black's method may well be fruitful, but in a given case it sometimes seems weak. He seems to see no difference between the folly of discharging a subway conductor for refusing to state whether he is a Communist and the Taft-Hartley Act requirement that a union official swear that he is not one. (Even so good a friend of free speech as Zechariah Chafee has said, "The Taft-Hartley oath was intended to remedy serious evils of industrial relations, such as strikes for political or revolutionary purposes.")

Since Black's fundamental tactic has been to get us to accept as old what are really new views, he does not speak of the growth of the law and does not admit that he has any part in making it, as judges who have been teachers are so fond of doing. At the most he admits to helping restore the law to its original purpose. Mere reason may tell us that this is an absurd doctrinaire attitude, but it has been amazingly successful as a judicial method, and the vulgar test of success is not a bad one to apply in a field that has so few demonstrable rules as constitutional law.

Black's method is successful because if one is to explicate a text well, one must have faith in the task, in the value of the text itself. It is perhaps no more absurd for Black to look for ultimate wisdom in an 18th-century document, the creation of an anxious period that had its own problems to solve, than it is for us to find profound insights about ourselves in the plays Shakespeare threw together hastily. It is part of our romantic heritage that we have more faith in poets as lawmakers than in lawmakers as poets. To say, as we do, that the Constitution is what the judges say it is may not so much deny its existence as assert that as Shakespeare has been enriched by Coleridge and his other great critics, so it has been enriched by its interpreters. If in our few best moments we are able to read Shakespeare as if he were a sacred text, finding among the ambiguities of poetry some of our few certainties about life, it should be possible for us to believe that a judge can read the Constitution, his sacred text, as if it were Shakespeare and find in it his vision of the absolute.

It is certainly not a dangerous vision today. So many forces in the courts, in government and society, so much of what we call moderation and prudence and the art of the possible, so much even of liberalism itself, make against freedom that no force on its side can be extreme. Hugo Black's stand through the years for absolute freedom may help assure us an indispensable minimum.

---

* I do not pretend to write impartially on libel, for as a lawyer I have been concerned with it chiefly from the point of view of publishers and authors.

---

JAMES GROSSMAN, who practices law in New York, last appeared in our January 1962 issue with "The Sacco-Vanzetti Case Reconsidered." Author of the volume on James Fenimore Cooper in the American Men of Letters series, he has also written for many magazines, including Partisan Review and Kenyon Review.

news

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

STEPHEN WISE CONGRESS HOUSE, 15 EAST 84th STREET • NEW YORK 28, N. Y. • TRAFALGAR 9-4500

Richard Cohen, Director
Department of Public Relations

Supreme Court

LWD
VJ
PA
BR

For Release
Sunday, October 6

SUPREME COURT HELD 'MORE FIRMLY UNITED THAN EVER' IN ROLE AS DEFENDER OF RIGHTS

Annual Analysis of High Court Decisions by American Jewish Congress Finds 'Remarkable' Percentage of Rulings Upholding Asserted Constitutional Guarantees

COURT SEEN FILLING A 'VACUUM' CREATED BY 'DEFAULT' OF CONGRESS ON CIVIL RIGHTS

The United States Supreme Court, which begins its new term tomorrow (Monday), was described in a report issued yesterday as "more firmly united than ever before in its role as the great defender of the basic freedoms of the American people."

In its annual analysis of the decisions of the high court, the American Jewish Congress said the 1962-63 term was "remarkable" for the percentage of rulings upholding racial equality, separation of church and state, freedom of expression and other Constitutional guarantees.

The 83-page summary and analysis, seventh in an annual series, was prepared by the AJC commission on law and social action under Leo Pfeffer, director; Joseph B. Robison, assistant director; and Carol Weisbrod, staff counsel. Ephraim London is chairman of the commission.

All Major Cases Decided Unanimously or Nearly So

The survey covered 42 cases, of which 34 were decided in favor of the person or group seeking vindication of civil rights or civil liberties. This amounted to 80.9 per cent, as compared with 63.5 per cent during the previous six years.

Particularly significant, the survey found, was that the major decisions on pressing national issues among the 42 cases were all unanimous or near-unanimous. These included rulings upholding Negro sit-in demonstrations in the South, outlawing Bible-reading and prayer recitation in public schools, requiring states to provide legal counsel for indigent defendants in all criminal cases and ordering that the principle of one-person, one-vote be applied in statewide and countywide elections.

MORE

The unanimity of the court can be explained in part, the survey noted, by the fact that relatively few cases involving internal security came before it during the 1962-63 term. This issue has been the major source of division in the court within recent years, it was stated.

Court Seen Acting in Face of 'Default' by Congress on Civil Rights

The report said that during the past 15 years the high court has been "increasingly involved" with civil rights and civil liberties issues, reflecting the growing concern of the American people with these issues.

In its decisions on these questions, the study commented, the Supreme Court "appears to have stepped into the vacuum created by the default of Congress in discharging the responsibilities imposed on it by the Constitution."

The American Jewish Congress analysis noted that the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments gave "primary responsibility" for protecting Negro rights to the Legislative branch. Yet for more than 75 years, the report said, "not a single law was adopted by Congress to make real this promise of equality.

"The two modest if not minor civil rights laws enacted by Congress in 1957 and 1960 have hardly come close to fulfilling Congressional responsibility," the survey continued, adding:

"The contribution of the Supreme Court to the struggle for racial equality has been much greater than that of the Presidents (Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy) and of course immeasurably greater than that of Congress."

The report pointed out that a little-noted decision by the court in the Peterson case, setting aside the convictions of Negro sit-in demonstrators protesting segregation at department store lunch counters in Greenville, S. C., "may turn out to be one of major importance, ranking in significance with the landmark cases of Baker v. Carr [legislative malapportionment] and Engel v. Vitale [New York Regents' prayer] of the 1961-62 term." The American Jewish Congress study declared:

"The Peterson decision and its companion decisions reflect a willingness on the part of the court to provide a legal framework in which the Negro may strive for his own emancipation. It has, in effect, indicated that it will not repeat the tragic mistake of the Dred Scott decision but, on the contrary, will seek to create a lawful and peaceful transition from racial inequality to racial equality."

'Liberal' Bloc Held Dominant

While the court is united on the major issues of national concern such as racial equality and church-state separation, individual differences among the justices on other questions still permit a division of the bench into "liberal" and "conservative" wings, the analysis found.

MORE

Appointment of Justices Arthur J. Goldberg and Byron White to succeed Felix Frankfurter and Charles Whittaker, the report said, shifted the line-up of the court from a 5-to-4 "conservative" majority to a 5-to-4 "liberal" majority.

A tally of the individual voting records of the nine justices showed that Justice Goldberg sided most frequently with the "liberals" — Warren, Brennan, Black and Douglas — while Justice White voted on many cases with the "conservatives" — Clark, Harlan and Stewart. Before their retirement from the bench, Justices Frankfurter and Whittaker voted most frequently with the "conservative" wing.

The summary showed that eleven of the 42 cases covered in the 1962-63 study were decided by 5-to-4 votes. All but one of these were carried by the "liberals."

Justices' Voting Records Analyzed

The American Jewish Congress report analyzed the justices' opinions according to whether they were favorable or unfavorable to the individual or group asserting a Constitutional or civil right. This method was adopted in preparing the survey, it was explained, as a relatively objective method of classification. There was no assumption that the person claiming the right was necessarily justified in doing so.

The difference between the "liberal" and "conservative" blocs was most apparent, according to the report, in a comparative tabulation of the votes of the justices in the 42 cases covered. Of the five "liberal" justices, Douglas showed a record of 39 favorable and 3 unfavorable votes; Warren, Black and Brennan each voted 38 and 4; and Goldberg voted 37 and 5.

The "conservative" wing consisted of Justices White (23 favorable, 19 unfavorable); Stewart (21 and 21); Clark (18 and 24) and Harlan (14 and 28).

RCrc-10/2/63 X X X
DM:NP:W:CP:Off:Reg:Aff.

Memorandum from . . . . AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS
15 East 84th Street, New York 28, N. Y. • TRafalgar 9-4500

Supreme Court

October 24, 1963

To: Community Relations Councils
Group Relations Agencies

From: Joseph B. Robison

Subject: Summary and Analysis of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Decisions of the 1962-63 Term of the Supreme Court.

We enclose herewith the seventh in our annual series of Summaries and Analyses of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the field of civil rights and civil liberties.

The report reveals that the Supreme Court continues to be a steadfast guardian of the liberties of the people as guaranteed in the broad provisions of the Bill of Rights. While the Court is sometimes sharply divided, its major decisions of the past Term, notably in the areas of civil rights and religious liberty, were unanimous or nearly so. Thus, there was no more than one dissenting vote in any of the leading cases of the past Term, the Schempp Bible reading case, the Peterson decision dealing with sit-in demonstrations, the Gray case condemning the "county unit" system in primary elections for state-wide office and the Gideon case holding that states must provide indigent defendants with legal counsel for their defense in all criminal cases.

Previous years have seen a division of the Court into a conservative bloc of five and a liberal bloc of four. Changes in the personnel of the Court have given the liberal bloc the same narrow margin. However, it should be noted that, at least during the 1962-63 Term, this division manifested itself principally in cases dealing with procedural points rather than the establishment of fundamental principles.

We trust you will find this Summary and Analysis interesting and useful.

Encl.

253

THE CIVIL RIGHTS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES DECISIONS

of the

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

for the

1962-1963 TERM

---

A SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

---

Prepared by the

COMMISSION ON LAW AND SOCIAL ACTION

OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

15 East 84th Street

New York 28, N. Y.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | Page |
|---|---|
| INTRODUCTION | 1 |
| SUMMARY OF CASES DECIDED | 8 |
| I. CIVIL RIGHTS | 9 |
| (1) Goss v. Board of Education, 83 S. Ct. 1405 | 9 |
| (2) McNeese v. Board of Education, 83 S. Ct. 1433 | 10 |
| Meredith v. Fair, 83 S. Ct. 10 | 12 |
| (3) Watson v. Memphis, 83 S. Ct. 1314 | 12 |
| (4) Wright v. Georgia, 83 S. Ct. 1240 | 14 |
| (5) Johnson v. Virginia, 83 S. Ct. 1053 | 15 |
| (6) Peterson v. City of Greenville, 83 S. Ct. 1119 | 16 |
| Gober v. Birmingham, 83 S. Ct. 1311 | 16 |
| Avent v. North Carolina, 83 S. Ct. 1311 | 16 |
| (7) Lombard v. Louisiana, 83 S. Ct. 1122 | 17 |
| (8) Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 83 S. Ct. 1130 | 18 |
| (9) Colorado Anti-Discrimination Commission v. Continental Air Lines, 83 S. Ct. 1022 | 20 |
| II. INTERNAL SECURITY | 21 |
| (10) Yellin v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1828 | 21 |
| (11) Wheeldin v. Wheeler, 83 S. Ct. 1441 | 23 |
| (12) Gastelum-Quinones v. Kennedy, 83 S. Ct. 1819 | 25 |
| III. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND ELECTIONS | 26 |
| A. Religious Freedom | 26 |
| (13) School District of Abington Township v. Schempp, and Murray v. Curlett, 83 S. Ct. 150 | 26 |
| (14) Sherbert v. Verner, 83 S. Ct. 1790 | 29 |
| Arlan's Department Store v. Kentucky, 83 S. Ct. 277 | 31 |
| B. Censorship | 32 |
| (15) Bantam Books Inc. et al. v. Sullivan, 83 S. Ct. 631 | 32 |
| C. Freedom of Speech | |
| (16) Edwards v. South Carolina, 83 S. Ct. 680 | 34 |
| D. Freedom of Association | |
| (17) Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 83 S. Ct. 889 | 35 |
| (18) NAACP v. Button, 83 S. Ct. 328 | 35 |
| E. Elections | |
| (19) Gray v. Sanders, 83 S. Ct. 801 | 40 |

Page

IV. IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY 41

(20) Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 83 S. Ct. 554 41
(21) Rusk v. Cort, 83 S. Ct. 554 41
(22) Rosenberg v. Fleuti, 83 S. Ct. 1804 45
Schneider v. Rusk, 83 S. Ct. 621 46

V. OTHER CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS 47

A. Searches, Arrests, Electronic Devices and the Use of Illegally Obtained Evidence 47

(23) Ker v. California, 83 S. Ct. 1623 47
(24) Wong Sun and James Toy v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 407 49
(25) Lopez v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1381 52
(26) Cleary v. Bolger, 83 S. Ct. 385 54

B. Self-incrimination 56

(27) Shotwell Manufacturing Company v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 448 56
(28) Namet v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1151 58

C. Confessions 59

(29) Lynumn v. Illinois, 83 S. Ct. 917 59
(30) Haynes v. Washington, 83 S. Ct. 1336 60

D. Double Jeopardy 61

(31) Downum v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1033 61

E. Right to Counsel 62

(32) Gideon v. Wainwright, 83 S. Ct. 792 62
(33) White v. Maryland, 83 S. Ct. 1050 65
(34) Douglas v. California, 83 S. Ct. 814 65
(35)
F. Right of Indigents to Free Transcript of Testimony 67

(35) Lane v. Brown, 83 S. Ct. 768 67
(36) Draper v. Washington, 83 S. Ct. 774 68
(37) Norvell v. Illinois, 83 S. Ct. 1366 69

G. Due Process and Equal Protection 71

(38) Rideau v. Louisiana, 83 S. Ct. 1417 71
(39) Brady v. Maryland, 83 S. Ct. 1194 72
Willner v. Committee on Character and Fitness, 83 S. Ct. 1175 73

Page

H. Habeas Corpus

(40) Fay v. Noia, 83 S. Ct. 822 73
(41) Townsend v. Sain, 83 S. Ct. 745 76
(42) Jones v. Cunningham, 83 S. Ct. 373 78

ANALYSIS OF THE VOTES OF THE INDIVIDUAL JUSTICES 79

TABLES

I. DISPOSITION OF CASES BY COURT, 1962-1963 83

II. TOTAL VOTES OF JUSTICES, 1962-1963 83

III. DISPOSITION OF CASES BY COURT, 1957-63 84

IV. TOTAL VOTES OF JUSTICES, 1957-1963 84

V. VOTES IN CIVIL RIGHTS CASES 85

VI. VOTES IN INTERNAL SECURITY AND IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY CASES 86

VII. VOTES IN FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION CASES 87

VIII. VOTES IN OTHER CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS 88

INTRODUCTION

Our introduction to last year's Summary and Analysis of the Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Decisions of the United States Supreme Court noted that there had been a sharp drop during the Term covered by that Summary in the number of civil rights and civil liberties cases given full consideration and decision by the Court. During the 1960-1961 Term there had been 54 such decisions whereas during the 1961-1962 Term there had been only 28, just slightly more than half the number in the previous years. We suggested, nevertheless, that the conclusion we had drawn from the earlier study - that the Court fashioned by Marshall to be the supreme protector of property rights and to safeguard commerce, industry and finance from hostile legislatures had been replaced by a Court which deemed its constitutional function to be the protection of the liberties of the people - was still valid. We suggested further that the explanation for the drop in the number of civil rights and civil liberties decisions was to be found in temporary and accidental factors.

This suggestion appears to be validated by this year's Summary and Analysis (the seventh in an annual series). During the 1962-1963 Term, the number of civil rights and civil liberties decisions in which opinions were written increased to 42, 50% more than last year, although still below the top achieved during the 1960-1961 Term.

Analysis of the decisions of this Term as well as the previous Terms covered by this series, supports a number of other conclusions regarding the role of the Supreme Court in the American political system. More than a century ago, de Tocqueville noted that in the United States sooner or later all political issues become legal issues and get to the courts. Whether or not this statement is too broad, it nevertheless is true that in this country the Supreme Court has become the forum for the resolution of controversies that divide the community.

The work of the Court reflects, perhaps better than the operations of any other organ of government, the critical issues that confront the American people. Since the judicial revolution of 1937 (see Introduction to AJCongress Summary 1960-1961), the Court has abandoned the field of restraining or censoring social welfare legislation. The reason for this is that the great depression of the 1930's convinced the American people that the American capitalist economy could not survive except in the framework of a modified welfare state. The Supreme Court is not faced today with questions regarding the constitutionality of laws for social security, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, wages and hours, graduated income taxes, etc., because, notwithstanding the unhappiness of some extreme rightists with these laws, there is a practically universal consensus that they are here to stay and will always be part of our social system. On the other hand, during the same period (roughly, the past 15 years), the Court has been heavily involved in cases involving civil rights and civil liberties because the American people have been deeply involved and divided in these areas.

The extent to which the Court's actions reflect the people's concerns is indicated further by an examination of the nature of the civil rights and civil liberties cases in which the Court has acted. During the past Term, the Court wrote opinions in nine civil rights cases (all affecting Negroes) and in only three internal security cases. In contrast, during the 1956-1957 Term (the first covered in our series), the Court wrote opinions in 15 internal security cases and in only two civil rights cases. The explanation for the difference, we suggest, lies in the fact that in 1956 the principal American concern was interna security; today, it is the Negro's struggle for equality.

The results and the divisions of the Justices in these two classes of cases are also significant. All nine civil rights cases were decided in favor of the claimed right; in the internal security cases the score was two to one in favor of the claimed right. This corresponds to the results during the seven year period covered by our series; the cumulative score is 30 to 4 in the civil rights cases, and 29 to 24 in the internal security cases. Moreover, in the civil rights cases the decisions during the past year were close to unanimous; only one Justice (Harlan) dissented in three of the nine cases, and even in those three his dissent was partial, addressed not to the substance but either to the inadequacy of the record or the failure to exhaust adequate state remedies On the other hand, in all three of the internal security cases, the Court was sharply divided, with the votes being either 5 - 4 or 6 - 3. It is probable that these results and divisions also reflect the American consensus - that on the whole the American people are more committed to achievement of equality by the Negro than they are to the protection of the constitutional liberties of actual and potential subversives.

Another conclusion concerning the Supreme Court's role in our political system that seems to emerge from our summaries is that the Court appears to have stepped into the vacuum created by the default of Congress in discharging the responsibilities imposed upon it by the Constitution. Each of the three post-Civil War amendments enacted to insure full equality for the Negro, the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth, provides that Congress shall have power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. It was undoubtedly contemplated and intended thereby that the primary responsibility for according equality to the Negro would lie with Congress. The Reconstruction Congress so interpreted the mandate of the Constitution and enacted a number of laws which, though in large measure nullified by decisions of the pre-1937 Supreme Court, nevertheless still supply the legal basis for much of the litigation in the Federal courts aimed at racially discriminatory practices. However, for more than three quarters of a century after 1875, when Congress enacted the last of the post-war civil rights statutes, not a single law was adopted by it to help make real the promise of equality expressed in the Amendments. The two modest if not minor civil rights laws enacted by Congress in 1957 and 1960 have hardly come close to fulfilling Congressional responsibility.

The existence of this vacuum, and the demand not merely by the Negro but by the overall American conscience that it be filled, have resulted in activities on the part of the other two arms of the Federal government, the executive and the judiciary, to an extent undoubtedly much greater than contemplated by the generation that added the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution. Of these two, the post-war generation undoubtedly contemplated that the responsibility of the executive would be greater than that of the judiciary. However, history has refused to agree with that decision. The contribution of the Supreme Court to the struggle for racial equality has been much greater than that of the Presidents (Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy), and of course immeasurably greater than that of Congress.

Judicial intervention has come only after the legislative branch of government has had more than adequate opportunity to discharge the responsibility initially given it by the Constitution. The case of Baker v. Carr, decided last year, illustrates this. In 1946, in the case of Colegrove v. Green, the Court refused to take jurisdiction of a suit aimed at correcting the gross inequalities in the value of urban and rural votes in the election of legislatures. The philosophy of the Court in that case was that primary if not exclusive responsibility for eliminating the inequalities rested with the legislative bodies, federal and state. The passage of 15 years showed clearly that those bodies were either unwilling or unable to act. Accordingly, in 1961, in Baker v. Carr, the Court announced that it was prepared to intervene to discharge a duty that had been abandoned by the organ of government to which it had initially been entrusted by our basic charter.

The willingness of the Court to provide a forum for the redress of profound grievances is a matter of great good fortune to the American people. For were there no such forum within our legal framework, it is certain that redress would be sought outside it. Our political and economic revolutions since the founding of our republic have been peaceful because there always has been a legal forum, legislative, executive or judicial, through which the changes required by our maturation and evolution could be effected without recourse to insurrection and unlawfulness. Unfortunately, this has not been the case in respect to our social revolution. Because of the default of all three branches of our government in the middle of the 19th century (the judiciary, in the case of Dred Scott v. Sanford), the controversy resulted in armed conflict. Now, a century later, the legislature has again defaulted in its responsibility, and the executive has responded niggardly and reluctantly; to appreciate this one need only compare the success of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in solving cases and obtaining convictions in the field of internal security with its dismal record in the field of civil rights. Whether there will again be a resort to wholesale violence and civil conflict may again depend on whether the Court will be able and willing to provide the means for a peaceful and lawful transition to a society of racial equality, which is as inevitable as was the transition from a laissez-faire economic system to the capitalist-welfare state in which we live.

In this respect the little-noted decision in Peterson v. City of Greenville during this Term may turn out to be one of major importance, ultimately ranking in significance with the landmark cases of Baker v. Carr and Engel v. Vitale of last year's Term. In the Peterson case, and in its extension in Lombard v. Louisiana and Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, the Court set aside convictions of Negroes engaged in sit-in demonstrations seeking to eliminate segregation at lunch counters in department stores. That the segregation, based as it was on the sanction of state law or action of state governmental officials, violated the Fourteenth Amendment was hardly open to question. (Even if the segregation had no governmental sanction to support it, it would be in violation of the intent of the generation that fought the Civil War and enacted the post-war civil rights statutes - although that intent had been frustrated by the Supreme Court's decision in the Civil Rights Cases of 1883, in which it held that the Fourteenth Amendment does not encompass non-governmental discrimination.) The failure of both the Congress and the President to provide a remedy has made it both necessary and inevitable that the Negro should resort to self-help in the form of sit-in demonstrations. The Peterson decision and its companion decisions reflect a willingness on the part of the Court to provide a legal framework in which the Negro may strive for his own emancipation. It has, in effect, indicated that it will not repeat the tragic mistake of the Dred Scott decision but, on the contrary, will seek to create a lawful and peaceful transition from racial inequality to racial equality.

The sit-in demonstrations were the first large-scale step in the Negro's revolutionary struggle for self-emancipation and they were among the first to reach the Court. It may be anticipated that other steps will likewise find their way to the Court seeking the sanction of constitutional law and, so long as they remain peaceful, probably meeting a similarly sympathetic and hospitable reception.

Three other cases decided by the Court during the past Term merit special mention. Unlike Peterson v. City of Greenville, none of these represented judicial striking out in new constitutional directions (although even the Peterson decision may have been somewhat anticipated by the 1946 decision of Marsh v. Alabama) but only the extension of existing frontiers. They are important for two reasons: first, their practical consequences, which will be nationwide and, secondly, the evidence they give that the Court has no intention of retreating from previous libertarian decisions but on the contrary is prepared to extend them and thus advance the development of freedom, justice and equality.

The most controversial of these decisions is undoubtedly School District v. Schempp, in which the Court declared unconstitutional devotional Bible reading and Lord's Prayer recitation in the public schools, thereby extending the principles announced in the McCollum decision of 1948 and last year's decision in Engel v. Vitale. The second of these decisions is Gray v. Sanders in which the Court held that Georgia's use of the "county unit" system in primary elections for statewide office violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The significance of the decision lies in the Court's exercise of jurisdiction under its decision in Baker v. Carr, last year, to hold that, at least insofar as statewide elections are concerned, the Amendment means "one person, one vote." The third decision is Gideon v. Wainwright in which the Court, extending the principles announced in earlier decisions, held that in all criminal cases, even those not involving the death penalty, the state must provide indigent defendants with legal counsel for their defense.

What is particularly gratifying and noteworthy about these four leading decisions of the 1962-1963 Term is that they were unanimous or practically so. All nine Justices joined in Peterson and Gideon, and in each of Schempp and Gray v. Sanders only one Justice dissented, Stewart in the former and Harlan in the latter.

The following Analysis consists of two parts. First, we describe the cases decided by the Court in the area of civil rights and civil liberties. Second, we present an analysis of the votes of the individual Justices during the Term.

SUMMARY OF CASES DECIDED

We discuss the Court's decisions on civil rights and civil liberties under five major headings: (1) "Civil Rights," which covers cases dealing with racial discrimination; (2) "Internal Security," which includes not only cases arising under security laws but all other cases involving persons charged with Communist affiliations; (3) "Immigration and Nationality," (4) "Freedom of Expression and Voting," which includes freedom of speech, press, religion and voting; and (5) "Other Criminal Proceedings," which covers cases, not included in the previous headings, in which the parties raised such questions as self-incrimination, double jeopardy, forced confessions and the right to counsel.

With only a few exceptions, we cover here cases in which the Court granted a hearing and reached a decision on the merits. In some of the cases, full opinions were not written but the Court's disposition of the matter nevertheless established legal principles. We have not attempted to cover generally the Court's rulings declining to hear cases (by dismissing an appeal or denying a petition for writ of certiorari). However, a few such rulings that appear to be significant have been described briefly.

I. CIVIL RIGHTS

Nine cases, an unusually large number, dealing with the struggle for equal rights reached the stage of full consideration and decision by the Court during the past year. Two dealt with schools, two with segregation in parks, one with segregated courtrooms, and one with fair employment legislation in a northern state. In addition, three cases decided together considered various aspects of the sit-in movement and other forms of protest demonstration.*

In Goss v. Board of Education, 83 S. Ct. 1405, a unanimous Court held unconstitutional that portion of Tennessee's proposed plan for school desegregation which permitted a student in a minority race to transfer back to a school where his race is in a majority. (The general plan provided for rezoning of school districts without reference to race.)

In an opinion by Justice Clark, the Court explained that "by the terms of the transfer provisions, a student, upon request, would be permitted, solely on the basis of his own race and the racial composition of the school to which he has been assigned by virtue of rezoning, to transfer from such school, where he would be in the racial minority, back to his former segregated school where his race would be in the majority." The Court found that this transfer system fostered the "perpetuation of segregation" particularly since it was not possible under the plan for a child to choose integration outside of his zone.

The Court held that classifications based on race for purposes of transfers between public schools, as here, violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. It noted that the superficial equality of enabling each race to transfer from a desegregated to a segregated school cannot save the plan.

---

* Three additional cases growing out of the civil rights struggle are dealt with below in the section on Freedom of Expression, (Edwards (No. 16), Gibson (No. 17) and Button (No. 18).

The fact that the transfer provision is based on race and operates only to promote segregation underscores the fact that the scheme as a whole has a racial character and purpose.

The Court concluded that "In reaching this result we are not unmindful of the deep-rooted problems involved." Indeed, it was consideration for these local problems and difficulties which led the Court in 1955, in the second Brown case to frame its order requiring desegregation of public schools in terms of "good faith compliance at the earliest practicable date," with "all deliberate speed." Now, however, "eight years after this decree was rendered and over nine years after the first Brown decision, the context in which we must interpret and apply this language to plans for desegregation has been significantly altered.... The transfer provisions here cannot be deemed to be reasonably designed to meet legitimate local problems, and therefore do not meet the requirements of Brown."

In McNeese v. Board of Education, 83 S. Ct. 1433, the Court held, 8 - 1, that failure of a Negro plaintiff to resort to an administrative remedy under the Illinois School Code did not bar the maintenance of a suit under the Federal Civil Rights Act to prevent a local Board of Education from continuing to operate a segregated public school system.

The plaintiff had alleged that a large number of students had been transferred from an overcrowded school, that was 97% white, to an under-utilized school, that was 100% Negro, and that the transferred students were rigidly segregated from the existing student body, even to the point of being required to use separate entrances and exits. The suit in a Federal Court was dismissed because the plaintiff had failed to apply to Illinois authorities for relief.

The procedure for relief under the state law involved getting 50 residents of the school district or 10% (whichever is less) to file a complaint with the Superintendent of Instruction that a student had been segregated because of his race. If, after a hearing, the Superintendent decided that the allegations were substantially correct, he could request the Attorney General to bring suit to rectify the practices subject to judicial review. Further, the Superintendent could withhold the certification necessary for state aid if he found that a school district practiced segregation.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Douglas held, first, that earlier Supreme Court decisions requiring resort to state remedies do not apply where, as here, "no underlying issue of state law" controls the litigation. The purpose of the Civil Rights Act, he said, was to override certain kinds of state laws; to provide remedies where state law was inadequate; or to provide supplementary remedies in the federal courts to any state remedies which might be available. "We would defeat these purposes if we held that assertion of a federal claim in a federal court must await an attempt to vindicate the same claim in a state court."

Further, "it is by no means clear that Illinois law provides ... an administrative remedy sufficiently adequate to preclude prior resort to a federal court for protection of ... federal rights." Aside from the problem of getting the 50 residents or 10% to sign the complaint, the Superintendent has no power to order corrective action. Finally, even if the Superintendent would refuse to certify a school district for state aid, the withholding of state aid at best is only an indirect sanction for violation of Fourteenth Amendment rights. "When federal rights are subject to such tenuous protection, prior resort to a state proceeding is not necessary."

Justice Harlan, dissenting, was of the opinion, first, that since the discriminatory practices here related to the manner in which a particular school district was formed and administered, "the federal courts should not initially become embroiled," but should leave the matter to local authorities. He asserted, too, that the state remedy in this case was not deficient, stressing that the process was subject to judicial review. Finally, he said "we should be slow to hold unavailing an administrative remedy afforded by a State which long before Brown v. Board of Education ... had outlawed both by its constitution and statutes racial discrimination in its public schools...."*

In Watson v. Memphis, 83 S. Ct. 1314, a unanimous Court held that the doctrine of "all deliberate speed" is not applicable to public recreational facilities and that the City of Memphis was not justified in delaying the desegregation of its public parks. In the course of its decision, the Court plainly implied its impatience with delays in school desegregation as well.

This action had been brought by Negro residents of Memphis to halt segregation in all parks, playgrounds and similar facilities operated by the city. The city's defense was that it had already desegregated a number of facilities and should be given time to desegregate the rest. The Federal District Court denied the plaintiffs' prayer for an immediate end of segregation and directed the city to submit a desegregation plan within six months. It relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in the school segregation cases allowing such delay. (It will be remembered that the Supreme Court's first decision in the Brown case in 1954 condemned segregation in public schools and its second decision, a year later, permitted gradual desegregation, "with all deliberate speed.")

---

* One other school case in which the Court took action was Meredith v. Fair, 83 S. Ct. 10, which involved James Meredith's application for admission to the University of Mississippi. A single Circuit Judge had repeatedly issued stays of the Circuit Court of Appeals mandate ordering Meredith's admission. During the summer recess of the Court, Meredith asked Justice Black to prevent further interference with the Circuit Court's mandate. Justice Black issued such an order, saying that there was no likelihood that the Supreme Court would disturb the lower court's decision, He also stated that, while he had power to act alone, he had submitted the matter to his Brethren, who agreed with his conclusion.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Goldberg said that the principle of "all deliberate speed" of the second Brown case was a modification of the usual principle that "constitutional rights are to be promptly vindicated." He said that in school desegregation, there was a need for this modification because of the practical difficulties stemming from compulsory attendance, and the fact that adequacy of teachers and facilities was of crucial significance. "Desegregation of parks and other recreational facilities does not present the same kinds of cognizable difficulties...." The Court said, therefore, that Memphis must sustain "an extremely heavy burden of proof" to justify the continuation of segregated recreational facilities, and held that it had failed to do so.

Specifically, the Court found that the fears of violence and disorder were purely speculative and that, in any case, law and order cannot be preserved by denying Negroes their rights. The Court also rejected the argument that additional supervision (which it was claimed would be necessary in unsegregated parks) would create additional cost and would cause the closing of playgrounds, thus depriving many children of recreational facilities. Even if this were true, "it is obvious that vindication of conceded constitutional rights cannot be made dependent upon any theory that it is less expensive to deny than to afford them."

The Court concluded that it was irrelevant that the recreational facilities available for Negroes might be roughly proportionate to their number and, therefore, presumably adequate to meet their needs. This argument "reflects an impermissible obeisance to the now thoroughly discredited doctrine of 'separate but equal.'"

A particularly striking aspect of the decision was the clear implication by the Court that it was not satisfied with the way in which its second decision in the Brown case was being used to delay school desegregation. The Court said:

> Given the extended time which has elapsed, it is far from clear that the mandate of the second Brown decision requiring that desegregation proceed with "all deliberate speed" would today be fully satisfied by types of plans or programs for desegregation of public educational facilities which eight years ago might have been deemed sufficient. Brown never contemplated that the concept of "deliberate speed" would countenance indefinite delay in elimination of racial barriers in schools.

In Wright v. Georgia, 83 S. Ct. 1240, a unanimous court reversed Georgia's conviction of six young Negroes for breach of the peace because they refused to obey a police officer's request that they leave a "white" city park in which they were playing basketball. The evidence in the case showed that the defendants had been playing basketball in the park in an orderly fashion, that the police went to the area as soon as they heard that Negroes were using it and that they ordered the defendants to leave. When the defendants refused to do so, they were arrested. They were, thereafter, convicted of disorderly conduct, by disturbing the public peace and not dispersing at the command of the police.

Chief Justice Warren, who delivered the Court's opinion, disposed first of the state's claim that the defendants had not complied with Georgia's extremely technical requirements for raising constitutional issues. Rejecting this claim, he quoted from earlier decisions, holding that "the assertion of Federal rights, when plainly and reasonably made, is not to be defeated under the name of local practice."

On the merits, Georgia argued first that the failure of the Negroes to obey the command of a police officer constituted a breach of the peace. As to this, the Court said, that "one cannot be punished for failing to obey the command of an officer if that command is itself violative of the Constitution." (Here the officers themselves testified that their intention was to enforce racial segregation in the park.) Georgia also argued that the Negroes were guilty of a breach of the peace because their activity was likely to cause a breach of the peace by others. The Court said that there was no substantial evidence to support this possibility of disorder and that, in any case, "the possibility of disorder by others cannot justify exclusion of persons from a place if they otherwise have a constitutional right (founded upon the Equal Protection Clause) to be present."

The Court concluded that "under any view of the facts ... it cannot be maintained that petitioners had adequate notice that their conduct was prohibited by the breach of the peace statute." It is well established that a "conviction under a criminal enactment which does not give adequate notice that the conduct charged is prohibited is violative of due process."

Segregation in courtrooms was dealt with summarily by the Court in Johnson v. Virginia, 83 S. Ct. 1053. Here, the defendant had seated himself in the section reserved for whites in a Virginia Traffic Court and had refused to move to the white section even when directed to do so by the judge. He was convicted of contempt of court and the Virginia courts upheld the conviction. The Court unanimously reversed, without hearing argument. Its brief per curiam opinion noted that "it is no longer open to question that a State may not constitutionally require segregation of public facilities." It added: "State-compelled segregation in a court of justice is a manifest violation of the State's duty to deny no one the equal protection of the laws."*

Late in the Term, the Court decided five cases growing out of sit-in demonstrations in the South -- three by full decision and two by brief orders. Justice Harlan filed a single separate opinion in these cases, dissenting in four and concurring separately in the fifth.

---

* The segregation dispute was also involved in Alabama v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1365, where the Court, unanimously, in a one-paragraph per curiam opinion, denied a motion by the State of Alabama for leave to file a suit to enjoin the President from alerting and stationing troops in the area of Birmingham.

In Peterson v. City of Greenville, 83 S. Ct. 1119, the Court held unanimously that the conviction of ten Negroes for a sit-in demonstration at a chain store's segregated lunch counter violated the equal protection clause where the segregation was required by a City ordinance. The ten defendants in this case were Negro boys and girls who entered the lunch counter at an S. H. Kress store in Greenville, S. C. to obtain service. The manager told them to leave. When they refused to do so, they were arrested. They were convicted of violating the South Carolina anti-trespass statute, which makes it illegal to fail to leave a privately-owned place when requested to do so by the owner.

Chief Justice Warren based the Court's reversal of the convictions on the fact that the City of Greenville had an ordinance requiring segregation in lunch counters. He declared that, since the city "has provided by its ordinance that the decision as to whether a restaurant facility is to be operated on a desegregated basis is to be reserved to it," the city "has removed that decision from the sphere of private choice." The convictions thus cannot stand even if, as the city claimed, the manager of the store would have excluded the Negroes independently of the city ordinance.

The convictions "had the effect, which the State cannot deny, of enforcing the ordinance passed by the City of Greenville, the agency of the state. When a State agency passes a law compelling persons to discriminate against other persons because of race, and the State's criminal processes are employed in a way which enforces the discrimination mandated by the law, such a palpable violation of the Fourteenth Amendment cannot be saved by attempting to separate the mental urges of the discriminators."*

* On the same day, the Court issued a one-sentence, per curiam decision, in Gober v. Birmingham, 83 S. Ct. 1311, reversing similar convictions on the authority of the Peterson case. In another one-sentence per curiam decision, the Court vacated the convictions in Avent v. North Carolina, 83 S. Ct. 1311 and remanded the case to the Supreme Court of North Carolina for further consideration in light of the Peterson case. The North Carolina court had decided the case on the erroneous assumption that no ordinance requiring restaurant segregation existed.

In Lombard v. Louisiana, 83 S. Ct. 1122, the Court held, by an 8 - 1 vote, that statements by public officials that sit-in demonstrations were prohibited had the same coercive effect as a city ordinance requiring segregation. Here, three Negro and one white student had been convicted for refusing to leave the lunch counter of a McCrory store in New Orleans. It appeared that, prior to the arrests, both the Mayor and the Superintendent of Police had issued statements on earlier sit-in demonstrations. Thus, the Mayor had stated that "It is my determination that the community interest, the public safety, and the economic welfare of this city require that such demonstrations cease and that henceforth they be prohibited by the police department." The evidence revealed that the restaurant manager has asked the defendants to leave in obedience to the directive of the city official.

Speaking for the Court, Chief Justice Warren concluded that the New Orleans city officials "determined that the city would not permit Negroes to seek desegregated service in restaurants. Consequently, the city must be treated exactly as if it had an ordinance prohibiting such conduct." The case was thus governed by the Peterson decision just described.

Justice Douglas filed a concurring opinion, joining in the Court's opinion but giving two additional grounds for reversal. First, he stressed that a public facility such as a restaurant "has no aura of constitutionally protected privacy about it." He concluded that when the State, through its officials or its courts, enforces discrimination by such a public enterprise, it violates the equal protection clause. Second, he noted that the restaurant held a license from the state and that its operation was extensively regulated by the state. "This restaurant is thus an instrumentality of the State since the State charges it with duties to the public and supervises its performance."

In Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 83 S. Ct. 1130, the Court, by a vote of 8 - 1, reversed the conviction of two ministers for aiding and abetting a violation of a city ordinance. The ministers had been charged with encouraging students to participate in sit-in demonstrations. One of the defendants, Reverend F. L. Shuttlesworth, a close associate of Reverend Martin Luther King, was sentenced to 180 days in jail at hard labor and a fine of $100.00. The other defendant was sentenced to 30 days and $25.00.

Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Warren noted that the two college students who had testified concerning the defendants' conduct were the same two whose conviction for criminal trespass was involved in Gober v. Birmingham (described above) in which their convictions were reversed by the Supreme Court. The Chief Justice said that "there can be no conviction for aiding and abetting someone to do an innocent act" and, since the convictions in Gober had been set aside, "it follows that the present petitioners did not incite or aid and abet any crime, and that therefore their own convictions must be set aside."

Justice Harlan wrote a separate opinion in which he discussed the Peterson, Lombard, Gober, Avent and Shuttlesworth cases, concurring in the result in Peterson, and dissenting in whole or in part in the other cases. His differences with the Court related primarily to the treatment of the state action issue.

Regarding the Peterson case, Justice Harlan disagreed with the Court's holding that the mere existence of the segregation ordinance rendered the state's enforcement of its trespass laws unconstitutional, regardless of whether the store owner's decision to exclude was actually influenced by the ordinance. However, he believed that the existence of the ordinance made out a prima facie case of invalid state action and that the state now had the burden of proving that the exclusion of Negroes was in fact solely the product of private choice. In the Peterson case the state had not sustained that burden of proof, since the evidence showed that the manager's exclusion of the Negroes had been based on the ordinance. Justice Harlan therefore joined in the Court's judgment.

In the Lombard case, Justice Harlan believed that the statements of the Mayor could not be compared with a city ordinance commanding segregated eating facilities because they were designed to preserve the peace rather than to require segregation. Had the chain store involved chosen to serve Negroes as well as the whites it could have done so without any official restraints.

However, Justice Harlan found that evidence indicating "advance collaboration" between the police and the chain store had been excluded by the trial court. Since such evidence, in his view, would have justified reversing the convictions, he would have remanded the case for a new trial.

As to the Gober case, Justice Harlan believed that it was impossible to say from the record whether or not the judgments of conviction might be supported on independent and adequate state grounds under Alabama law. He therefore concluded that the case should be sent back to the Alabama courts for further action.

In the Avent case, Justice Harlan noted that, in affirming the convictions, the North Carolina court ignored the existence of a local segregation ordinance. He thus agreed with the Court that the case should be returned to the state courts for further consideration. However, since he disagreed with the majority's opinion in Peterson, he dissented from the judgment and opinion of the Court in Avent.

Justice Harlan said, finally, that the majority's holding in the Shuttlesworth case was based on the erroneous premise that Shuttlesworth was charged merely with inciting the sit-ins involved in the Gober case. Shuttlesworth was charged also with generally inciting violations of the Birmingham trespass ordinance and therefore the Court's reversal in the Gober case could not serve as the ground for reversal in Shuttlesworth. However, he said that, since the trespass which Shuttlesworth was convicted of inciting "may or may not have involved denials of equal protection, depending on the event of the 'state action' issue," he would send the case back for a new trial.

In Colorado Anti-Discrimination Commission v. Continental Air Lines, 83 S. Ct. 1022, a unanimous Court held that the Colorado statute prohibiting discrimination in employment could constitutionally be applied to an interstate air line. The State Commission administering the statute had found that Continental Air Lines had refused to hire a qualified Negro as a pilot, solely because of his race. The Colorado Supreme Court set aside the Commission's order on the ground that the state law could not be applied to an interstate carrier. The Supreme Court reversed.

The air line had two main lines of argument. The first was that the Colorado statute imposes an undue burden on interstate commerce and thus violates the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Justice Black, speaking for the Court, noted that while there were situations in which "the dangers and hardships of diverse regulation justify foreclosing a state from exercise of its traditional powers," this was not the case here since diverse regulation was not constitutionally possible. In earlier cases dealing with this problem, the Supreme Court had "assumed the validity both of state laws requiring segregation and of state laws forbidding segregation .... But under our more recent decisions any state or federal law requiring applicants for any job to be turned away because of their color would be invalid.... The kind of burden that was thought possible in [earlier cases], therefore, simply cannot exist here."

The Court also rejected the air line's second argument that federal law "has so pervasively covered the field of protecting people in interstate commerce from racial discrimination that the States are barred from enacting legislation in this field." The Court examined the Federal Aviation Act and the Railway Labor

Act, and referred to executive orders banning racial and religious discrimination in hiring. It concluded that these acts and orders were not intended to regulate air carrier discrimination so pervasively so as to invalidate state legislation attempting to accomplish the same purpose.

II. INTERNAL SECURITY

Only three cases involving aspects of internal security were decided by the Court during the 1962-63 Term, an unusually small number. (But see the Cort and Gibson cases described in the two succeeding sections.) Two of the cases involved the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the other an alien sought to be deported because of membership in the Communist Party.

In Yellin v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1828, the Court held, 5 - 4, that the failure of the House Committee on Un-American Activities to follow its own rules for the protection of witnesses during an investigation of Communist "colonization" of the steel industry vitiated the contempt conviction of a witness who refused to answer the Committee's questions.

The rules of the Committee provide that, "If a majority of the Committee ... believes that the interrogation of a witness in a public hearing might endanger national security or unjustly injure his reputation, or the reputation of other individuals, the Committee shall interrogate such witness in an executive session ...." When the defendant in this case was subponaed to appear as a witness at a Committee hearing, his attorney wired the Committee asking that he be heard in an executive session. He received a wire in reply from the Committee's staff director denying the request. At the hearing, the Committee refused to allow the exchange of wires to be placed in the record. Thereafter, the defendant refused to answer questions put to him, primarily on the ground that the questions violated his rights under the First Amendment's guarantees of freedom of expression. He was convicted of contempt of Congress.

In reversing his conviction, the Court did not reach the constitutional questions because it concluded that the Committee had failed to comply with its own rules. Chief Justice Warren, in the Court's opinion, noted that, under the Committee's rules, it may hold a public hearing even if it will injure the witness' reputation but that the Committee nevertheless has an obligation to consider the reputation of the witness and his efforts to protect it. The Court found, first, that the Committee did not consider injury to Yellin's reputation when it decided against calling him to testify in executive session and, second, that the Committee failed to act at all upon Yellin's express request for an executive session, since a staff director, who lacked the authority to do so, acted in the Committee's stead.

The Court rejected the argument that the Committee's rules were written to provide guides for the Committee and were not designed to confer rights upon witnesses. Chief Justice Warren noted that throughout the rules "the dominant theme is definition of the witness' rights and privileges." He held that after the Committee had failed to "exercise its discretion according to the standards which Yellin [had] a right to have considered," the only avenue open to Yellin which would protect his reputation was the one he took by refusing to testify.

Finally, the Court said that Yellin's rights were not forfeited by his failure to make clear at the time he was questioned that his refusal to answer questions was based upon the Committee's departure from its own rules. The Court said that Yellin was unable at the time of his hearing to know that his rights had been violated since, so far as he knew, the staff director had the authority to deny his request. It was not until his trial that the facts were revealed.

Justice White dissented, joined by Justices Clark, Harlan and Stewart. Justice White said, first, that "[S]ince petitioner did not refuse to testify at the hearing on the ground that it was a public rather than a private session ... he is not entitled, at this late stage, to rely upon the Committee's alleged failure to apply its executive session rule to him." If possible damage to his reputation was the grounds for his demanding an executive session under the Committee's rules, a decent respect for the House of Representatives would have required him to state this objection to the Committee itself. Further, Yellin's telegram did not "make out a substantial demand for an executive session" based on the Committee's rules.

Justice White also found that the Committee had properly applied its executive session rule to Yellin. The Committee had information that Yellin was a known Communist and the Committee believed its information to be reliable and adequate. Public interrogation of a witness, if the Committee's foundation for its questions rests on rumor, "falls within the area of unjust injury to reputation. But public revelation of the truth does not."

Finally, the dissenters said that much of the discussion was beside the point. Since Yellin refused to answer four questions, and since his sentence was to be served concurrently, if his refusal to answer any of the four was unjustified, the conviction must stand. One of the questions related to Yellin's place of residence before 1957. An answer to that question could not possibly be harmful to his reputation.

Wheeldin v. Wheeler, 83 S. Ct. 1441, involved a suit against a staff member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities for abuse of process. The Court voted, 6 - 3, to dismiss the proceedings.

The plaintiffs in this case asserted that the defendant, a Committee investigator, had served them with subpoenas, entirely without authority from any Committee members, as required by statute. They further asserted that the subpoenas had been served on them while they were at work, that as a result they lost their jobs and that it had been the defendant's intent to subject them to public shame and a false stain of disloyalty. Suing in a federal court, they asked for an injunction and money damages. Since the subpoenas were not enforced, the only issue was the claim for damages. The lower courts dismissed the action, on ground the Supreme Court regarded as invalid. However, the Court affirmed, holding that there was no federal cause of action.

Justice Douglas, in the Court's opinion, first rejected the claim that the subpoenas constituted an unreasonable search or seizure, in violation of the Fourth Amendment, noting that there was neither a search nor a seizure. The Court further rejected the claim that there was a federal right, assertable in federal courts, not to be subjected to abuse of federal process. It held that Congress had not created any such right by statute and that this was not a case in which the Court could create a "federal common law" right. Hence, any right that the aggrieved parties had was under the state common law concerning abuse of process and could be asserted only in the state courts.

Justice Brennan dissented, with Chief Justice Warren and Justice Black in agreement. He noted that the questions decided by the Court had not been discussed in the lower courts and hence had not been fully briefed or discussed in the Supreme Court. He would have remanded the case to the lower courts for full consideration, believing that the disposition made by the Court was open to serious question. Thus, he argued that the complaint clearly stated a general common law cause of action for abuse of process and that there was adequate basis for creating a federal common law dealing with abuse of federal process. He said that, where it is alleged that a federal officer has so abused his powers "as to cause unjustifiable injury to a private person, I see no warrant for concluding that state laws must be looked to as the sole basis for liability."

In Gastelum-Quinones v. Kennedy, 83 S. Ct. 1819, the Court held, 5 - 4, that proof that an alien had for two years attended meetings of and paid dues to a local club of the Communist Party is not sufficient evidence of "meaningful association" to warrant deportation under the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. (The act subjects to deportation aliens, who, after entry, became members of the Party.)

Speaking for the majority, Justice Goldberg said that the statute had been previously interpreted by the Supreme Court as meaning that deportability on the grounds of being a member of the Communist Party turns on whether the alien was "aware that he was joining an organization known as the Communist Party which operates as a distinct and active political organization" and whether the alien had a "meaningful association" with the Party.

Here, the Court found the evidence of association with the Party, consisting of the testimony of two government witnesses, insufficient to establish the government's case. The Court rejected the argument that, since the defendant failed to produce evidence in response to the government's proof, there was an inference of meaningful association. Deportation is a "drastic sanction" and "a holding of deportability must therefore be premised upon evidence of 'meaningful association' more directly probative than a mere inference based upon the alien's silence." From the evidence of the government witnesses, "the dominating impulse to petitioner's affiliation with the Communist Party may well have been wholly devoid of any 'political' implications."

Justice White dissented, joined by Justices Clark, Harlan and Stewart. He asserted, first, that since the sole issue presented to the lower courts was whether the Board of Immigration Appeals should have re-opened the proceedings to allow the defendant to show that he had never personally believed in the violent overthrow of the government, the majority should not have resurrected the issue of meaningful association, supposedly settled in the previous proceeding in the case. (The majority opinion did not discuss this point.) He concluded further that the facts in this case were sufficient to justify a finding of voluntary and meaningful membership. He referred to the general rule that the findings of administrative agencies are not to be overturned by the courts if there is substantial evidence to warrant the inferences they drew, finding no reason to apply a different rule here.

III. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND ELECTIONS

A. Religious Freedom

In School District of Abington Township v. Schempp and Murray v. Curlett, 83 S. Ct. 1560, the Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional, by a vote of 8 - 1, the practice of devotional Bible reading and recitation of the Lord's Prayer in public schools.

The Schempp case challenged the validity of a Pennsylvania law requiring the reading without comment of ten verses from the Holy Bible on the opening of public school each day. The statute provided that any child shall be excused from participation or attendance at the written request of his parent or guardian. In the particular high school attended by the plaintiffs' children, the Bible reading exercises were broadcast each morning through an intercommunication system, followed by recitation of the Lord's Prayer. Although the school furnished only the King James (Protestant) version of the Bible, the student selected to do the reading could use a different version, and at times the Douay (Catholic) and Jewish versions were used. There were no prefatory statements and no interpretation given at or during the exercises. A statutory three-judge federal court unanimously held that the reading of the verses, even without comment, possessed a devotional and religious character, and constituted in effect a religious observance. The practice was, therefore, held unconstitutional and its discontinuance decreed.

In the Murray case no statute was involved. The suit, brought by an avowed atheist, challenged the daily Bible reading and Lord's Prayer recitation which had been practiced in the Baltimore public schools pursuant to a rule of the city board of school commissioners that had been promulgated in 1905. No trial was held in the Murray case, as the Maryland trial court dismissed the complaint and the state's highest court upheld the dismissal.

Writing for the Court, Justice Clark said there is an overlapping between the non-establishment and free exercises clauses of the First Amendment. He went on:

> ... The Establishment Clause has been directly considered by this Court eight times in the past score of years and, with only one Justice dissenting on the point, it has consistently held that the clause withdrew all legislative power respecting religious belief or the expression thereof. The test may be stated as follows: what are the purpose and primary effect of the enactment? If either is the advancement or inhibition of religion then the enactment exceeds the scope of legislative power as circumscribed by the Constitution. That is to say that to withstand the strictures of the Establishment Clause there must be a secular legislative purpose and a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion... The Free Exercise Clause, likewise considered many times here, withdraws from legislative power, state and federal, the exertion of any restraint on the free exercise of religion.... The distinction between the two clauses is apparent - a violation of the Free Exercise Clause is predicated on coercion while the Establishment Clause violation need not be so attended.

Applying these principles to the cases before it, the Court found that, since the challenged exercises are of a religious character, they are unconstitutional.

In the Maryland case, it was argued by the school authorities that the purpose of the morning program was not religious but secular, in that it sought to promote moral values. But, Justice Clark said, even if its purpose is not strictly religious, it is sought to be accomplished through readings from the Bible, and the "place of the Bible as an instrument of religion cannot be gainsaid."

The Court also rejected the contention that its decision collides with the majority's right to the free exercise of religion. The free exercise clause, said Justice Clark, "has never meant that a majority could use the machinery of the State to practice its beliefs." The opinion concluded:

> The place of religion in our society is an exalted one, achieved through a long tradition of reliance on the home, the church and the inviolable citadel of the individual heart and mind. We have come to recognize through bitter experience that it is not within the power of government to invade that citadel, whether its purpose or effect be to aid or oppose, to advance or retard. In the relationship between man and religion, the State is firmly committed to a position of neutrality.

Justice Goldberg, in a concurring opinion in which Justice Harlan joined, emphasized that the Court's decision does not require a state or its public schools to ignore religion. "Neither the state nor this Court," he said, "can or should ignore the significance of the fact that a vast portion of our people believe in and worship God and that many of our legal, political and personal values derive historically from religious teachings.... The Court would recognize the propriety of providing military chaplains and of the teaching about religion, as distinguished from the teaching of religion, in the public schools."

In his concurring opinion, Justice Douglas pursued the theme first expressed by him in the Regents' Prayer case, Engel v. Vitale (See AJCongress Summary 1961-1962, p. 30) that even a minimal expenditure of governmental funds for religious purposes violates the establishment clause. That clause, he stated, "forbids the State to employ its facilities or funds in a way that gives any church, or all churches, greater strength in our society than it would have by relying on its members alone."

Justice Brennan, concurring, offered a lengthy analysis of all the Court's previous church-state decisions and concluded that the Constitution forbids "those involvements of religious with secular institutions which (a) serve the essentially religious activities of religious institutions; (b) employ the organs of government for essentially religious purposes; or (c) use essentially religious means to serve governmental ends, where secular means would suffice."

Justice Stewart, dissenting, believed that there was a substantial free exercise claim on the part of those who desire to have their children's school day open with the reading of passages from the Bible. He said that the use of government property for religious purposes becomes unconstitutional only when it is used to support the proseletyzing activities of religious sects. It follows from this that devotional Bible reading and Lord's Prayer recitation are unconstitutional only if there is a restriction through coercion or restraint upon the free exercise of religion. Since the record in these cases was not clear on the issue of coercion, he would have remanded the cases to the trial courts.

In Sherbert v. Verner, 83 S. Ct. 1790, the Court held, over two dissents, that the free exercise clause of the First Amendment prohibits the denial of unemployment compensation benefits to a Seventh Day Adventist who refused to work on Saturday because of her religious beliefs. The appellant had worked for a textile mill for several years when it changed its work week to include Saturday. When she refused to work on that day, she was discharged. Since she refused other available jobs on the same ground, she was denied unemployment benefits under the South Carolina statute which bars compensation if an applicant rejects available jobs "without good cause." The state courts upheld the denial of compensation.

In an opinion by Justice Brennan, the Court found that, if the denial of benefits were to withstand the constitutional challenge, it must be either because the disqualification represented no "infringement by the State of ... constitutional rights of free exercise" or because any incidental burden on free exercise may be justified by a compelling state regulatory interest. The Court found, first, that the disqualification for benefits clearly imposed a substantial burden on the free exercise of religion, since the appellant could follow the precepts of her religion only if she forfeited benefits under the statute. Further, the Court pointed out that South Carolina statutes expressly exempt the Sunday worshipper from having to make this kind of choice. "The unconstitutionality of the disqualification of the Sabbatarian is thus compounded by the religious discrimination which South Carolina's general statutory scheme necessarily effects."

The Court then said that there was here no overriding state interest in enforcing the existing provisions of the statute which might justify the infringement of First Amendment rights. It rejected the argument that the possibility of spurious claims was adequate justification. The Court distinguished this case from Braunfeld v. Brown, in which it upheld Sunday closing laws even as against Sabbatarians (see AJCongress Summary 1960-61, p. 48), on the ground that in Braunfeld there was a compelling state interest in a uniform day of rest for all workers, which could have been achieved only by declaring Sunday to be that day.

The Court also rejected the claim that its decision "established" the Seventh Day Adventist religion in South Carolina in contravention of the First Amendment. The "extension of unemployment benefits to Sabbatarians in common with Sunday worshippers reflects nothing more than the governmental obligation of neutrality in the face of religious differences ...."

Justice Douglas, concurring, noted that there were many small religious denominations in this country whose tenets "could easily be trod upon under the guise of 'police' or 'health' regulations reflecting the majority's views." He referred to his dissent in the Sunday law cases, emphasizing that "/t/he harm is the interference with the individual's scruples or conscience -- an important area of privacy which the First Amendment fences off from government."

Justice Stewart concurred in the result but rejected the majority's line of reasoning. He said that there are many situations where "legitimate claims under the Free Exercise Clause will run into head-on collision with the Court's insensitive and sterile construction of the Establishment Clause," as in the Bible reading cases above. The Court's construction of the establishment clause, he said, "requires South Carolina ... to deny the appellant's claim for unemployment compensation ...." This "poses no problem for me, because I think the Court's mechanistic concept of the Establishment Clause is historically unsound and constitutionally wrong...." He also found the present decision inconsistent with Braunfeld v. Brown (since he did not agree that there was less direct burden on religious practices in the Braunfeld case) and concluded that Braunfeld should be overruled.

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice White in dissent, said first that, despite the Court's protestations to the contrary, the decision necessarily overrules Braunfeld v. Brown. Second, this holding violates the establishment clause, since the state must "single out for financial assistance those whose behavior is religiously motivated,...." Justice Harlan said that, while a state could constitutionally create an exemption for Sabbatarians if it so desired, it is not constitutionally compelled to do so. "Such compulsion in the present case is particularly inappropriate in light of the indirect, remote, and insubstantial effect of the decision below on the exercise of appellant's religion and in light of the direct financial assistance to religion that today's decision requires." *

* A reverberation of the Court's Sunday law decisions of 1961 appeared in Arlan's Department Store v. Kentucky, 83 S. Ct. 277, in which the Court dismissed an appeal from the conviction of the owners of a Louisville store for violating Kentucky's Sunday law. That law contains an exemption for those who observe a Sabbath other than Sunday. In their appeal to the Supreme Court, the defendants claimed that this exemption constituted discrimination in favor of certain religious groups, thereby making the statute unconstitutional under the First Amendment as made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth. The Court, without opinion, dismissed the appeal for want of a substantial federal question. Justice Douglas, who had been the sole dissenter from the Court's 1961 decision upholding Sunday laws generally, filed a brief dissent. He regarded the law as "plainly an aid to all organized religions, bringing to heel anyone who violates the religious scruples of the majority by seeking his salvation not through organized religion but on his own."

B. Censorship

In Bantam Books Inc., et al. v. Sullivan, 83 S. Ct. 631, the Supreme Court held, 8 - 1, that the circulation by the Rhode Island Commission to Encourage Morality In Youth of notices listing objectionable books, thanking a bookseller for his cooperation, and reminding the seller of the Commission's duty to recommend prosecution of purveyors of obscenity, constituted governmental censorship prohibited by the First Amendment. The Commission had been established by the state legislature with the purpose of educating the public concerning any book containing obscene language or manifestly tending toward the corruption of youth. This suit was brought by a group of publishers who showed that the Commission's activities prevented circulation of some of their books in Rhode Island. The publishers operated in the state through a distributor. The distributor had received letters from the Commission stating that certain books were "objectionable," asking cooperation in removing them from circulation and warning that the police would act in case of non-compliance. In order to avoid prosecution, the distributor promptly withdrew the books.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Brennan found that, although the Commission was limited to informal sanctions, the evidence showed that the Commission had undertaken to achieve the suppression of certain publications and had in fact succeeded. The Commission's operation was held "a form of effective state regulation superimposed upon the State's criminal regulation of obscenity and making such regulation largely unnecessary. In thus obviating the need to employ criminal sanctions, the State has at the same time eliminated the safeguards of the criminal process."

Justice Brennan said that, where systems of prior administrative restraint have been held constitutional, they have "operated under judicial superintendence and assured an almost immediate judicial determination of the validity of the restraint." Rhode Island procedures involved no such safeguards. Moreover, the Commission's statutory mandate was found to be vague. Books are marked "objectionable" without further elucidation. The distributor must speculate as to whether the book is considered "obscene or simply harmful to juvenile morality."

Justice Brennan noted that the Court was not barring consultation between the police and distributors before the institution of prosecutions where it took the form of advice to aid compliance with the law. Here, however, the Commission "acted as an agency not to advise but to suppress." Accordingly, the Court held that "the system of informal censorship disclosed by this record violates the Fourteenth Amendment." Since it did not invalidate the underlying statute, it presumably left the Commission free to find a new modus operandi.

Justice Black noted his concurrence in the result, but without submitting a separate opinion.

Justice Douglas joined in the opinion of the Court, emphasizing the lack of procedural safeguards and the dangers to freedom of expression. He also indicated his adherence to the views he expressed in his dissenting opinion in Roth v. United States (see AJCongress Summary of 1956-57, p. 18) respecting the "narrow scope of governmental authority to suppress publications on the grounds of obscenity."

Although Justice Clark concurred in the result, he asserted in a separate opinion that since the Court could not, under earlier decisions, strike down the Rhode Island obscenity statute completely, it should not drop "a demolition bomb 'on the Commission's practice' without clearly indicating what might be salvaged from the wreckage." He agreed that the Commission should "abandon its delusions of grandeur and leave the issuance of 'orders' to enforcement officials and 'the state's criminal regulation of obscenity' to the prosecutors." He noted, however, that, under the majority opinion, the Commission was free to engage in other activities relating to obscenity, such as publicizing findings as to the obscene character of any publication, sending its findings to publishers and distributors, and seeking the aid of state law enforcement officers in prosecuting offenders of the state obscenity law.

Justice Harlan, criticized the Court's opinion for failing to consider "the accommodation that must be made between Rhode Island's concern with the problem of juvenile delinquency and the right of freedom of expression assured by the Fourteenth Amendment." He believed that the reasons given by the Court for holding the procedures of the Rhode Island Commission unconstitutional were not of "overriding weight in the context of what is obviously not an effort by the State to obstruct free expression but an attempt to cope with a most baffling social problem."

C. Freedom of Speech.

In Edwards v. South Carolina, 83 S. Ct. 680, the Court held, 8 - 1, that the conviction of a number of Negro students for disturbing the peace violated the constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression. The record showed that some 187 Negro students had engaged in a peaceful demonstration against segregation on the grounds of the South Carolina State House. A crowd gathered to watch, but there was no violence and police protection was "ample." The students were allowed to demonstrate for some time and were then told to disperse. They refused to do so and started singing "The Star Spangled Banner" and other songs, and a "religious harangue" was made by one of the leaders. They were thereupon arrested for breach of the peace.

The Court found, in an opinion by Justice Stewart, that "the circumstances in this case reflect an exercise of these basic constitutional rights [of expression] in their most pristine and classic form." The evidence, said Justice Stewart, "showed no more than that the opinions which they were peaceably expressing were sufficiently opposed to the views of the majority of the community to attract a crowd and necessitate police protection." It was clear to the Court that in arresting, convicting and punishing the defendants under these circumstances South Carolina infringed their "constitutionally protected rights of free speech, free assembly, and freedom to petition for redress of their grievances."

To Justice Clark, dissenting, the question in this case was "whether a State is constitutionally prohibited from enforcing laws to prevent breach of the peace in a situation where city officials in good faith believe, and the record shows, that disorder and violence are imminent, merely because the activities constituting that breach contain elements of constitutionally protected speech and assembly." Justice Clark concluded that the police officers had interfered only when they apprehended imminent violence and that it was not a constitutional principle that the police, to preserve order, must act against the crowds and give immunity to the demonstrators.

D. Freedom of Association.

In Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 83 S. Ct. 889, the Court held, 5 - 4, that, absent substantial evidence of a connection between subversive activity and a local NAACP branch, a state investigative committee could not compel the president of the branch to use membership lists to refresh his memory as to whether specified individuals were members of the NAACP. The controversy began in 1956, when a committee of the Florida Legislature began to investigate the NAACP. The NAACP refused to produce its entire membership lists, and the Supreme Court of Florida held that, while it could not be compelled to produce and disclose the lists, the custodian of the lists would be compelled to bring them to the hearing and refer to them to determine whether specific individuals, identified as or suspected of being Communists, were NAACP members.

Gibson, the president of the Miami NAACP, refused to bring the lists. At the hearing, he volunteered to answer questions as to membership on the basis of his own information. When given the names and shown photographs of fourteen persons, he said that he could associate none of them with the NAACP. He was adjudged in contempt, sentenced to six months in jail and fined $1,200.00. His conviction was upheld by the Florida appellate courts.

Justice Goldberg, writing for the majority, noted that the parties agreed that the proper test to be applied in reconciling the claims of the government and the individual was whether a sufficient "nexus" had been shown between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state regulatory interest. After reviewing the evidence that some persons with known Communist affiliations had had some degree of activity in the NAACP, the Court concluded that the important right to "privacy of membership lists of groups engaged in the constitutionally protected free trade in ideas and beliefs may not be substantially infringed upon such a slender showing as here made by the respondent."

Justice Black, concurring, believed that "the constitutional right of association includes the privilege of any person to associate with Communists or anti-Communists ..." or "... with people of all kinds of beliefs, popular or unpopular ... I cannot understand by what constitutional authority Florida can compel answers to questions which abridge that right."

Justice Douglas, concurring, said that "[J]oining a group is often as vital to freedom of expression as utterance itself," and that the Fourteenth Amendment makes the First Amendment applicable to the states with the same force and to the same degree that the First Amendment itself is applicable to the Federal Government. "[T]he State and Federal Governments by force of the First Amendment, are barred from investigating any person's faith or ideology by summoning him or by summoning officers or members of his society, church or club."

Justice Harlan dissenting, joined by Justices Clark, Stewart and White, believed that the Court's holding as to the absence of "nexus" was unsound. In effect, the majority was requiring an investigating agency "to prove in advance the very things it is trying to find out." He also believed that the case did not present a serious question as to interference with freedom of association, in view of Gibson's willingness to testify about his own knowledge of NAACP membership.

Justice White, dissenting in a separate opinion, believed that "the opinion of the Court represents a serious limitation upon the Court's previous cases dealing with this subject matter and upon the right of the legislature to investigate the Communist Party and its activities." He concluded: "The net effect of the Court's decision is, of course, to insulate from effective legislative inquiry and preventive legislation the time-proven skills of the Communist Party in subverting and eventually controlling legitimate organizations."

In NAACP v. Button, 83 S. Ct. 328, the Court held 6 - 3 that litigation activities of the NAACP directed against segregation could not constitutionally be forbidden under Virginia's statutory ban on "the improper solicitation of legal business." Statutory regulation of unethical and nonprofessional conduct by attorneys had existed in Virginia since 1849 and the statutes had included a ban on improper solicitation of legal business. Until 1956, however, no attempt had been made to limit NAACP activities. In 1956 the legislature amended the statute to include as an illegal solicitor of legal business an agent for an organization which retains a lawyer in connection with an action to which it is not a party and in which it has no pecuniary right or liability. Litigation activities of the NAACP directed at ending racial segregation in Virginia public schools were banned under this revised statute.

The NAACP attacked the application of the Virginia statute on a number of grounds but the Court reached only one: that the statute abridged rights under the First Amendment protected against state action by the Fourteenth Amendment. In an opinion by Justice Brennan, the Court held that the activities of the NAACP "are modes of expression and association protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments which Virginia may not prohibit, under its power to regulate the legal profession, as improper solicitation of legal business...."

Justice White wrote a separate opinion, concurring in part and dissenting in part. He agreed that the Virginia statute as construed by the Virginia courts prohibited not only control of the litigation by the NAACP, but also advising the employment of particular attorneys. He also agreed that it is unconstitutional for a "State to prevent the exercise of constitutional rights in the name of preventing a lay entity from controlling litigation." He believed, however, that the majority would also strike down "a narrowly drawn statute proscribing only the actual day-to-day management and dictation of the tactics, strategy and conduct of litigation." Justice White concluded that neither the practice of law by a lay organization nor its management of the litigation of its members is constitutionally protected.

Justice Harlan, joined by Justices Clark and Stewart, dissented on the ground that striking down the Virginia statute "cannot be squared with accepted constitutional doctrine in the domain of state regulatory power over the legal profession." He emphasized that the NAACP determined the type of relief to be sought in legal actions, the timing of the suit and the form of pleading; that it did much more than advocate litigation; and that the normal incidents of the attorney-client relationship were often absent in litigation handled by staff attorneys. He believed that the evidence justified the Virginia court's finding of a violation of the statute, stressing that the Virginia court had construed the statute as not prohibiting the NAACP "from acquainting colored persons with what it believes to be their rights, or from advising them to assert those rights in legal proceedings...."

Justice Harlan agreed that litigation "is often the desirable and orderly way of resolving disputes of broad public significance, and of obtaining vindication of fundamental rights," particularly in the area of race relations. However, even as a form of expression, it may be reasonably regulated.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

[illegible] that the statute was not vague and that, even if it was, "The Court should excise only the ambiguous part of it, not strike down the enactment in its entirety."

E. Elections

In Gray v. Sanders, 83 S. Ct. 801, the Court held, 8 - 1, that Georgia's use of the "county unit" system in primary elections for statewide offices violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Under the Georgia statutes in effect when the suit was brought, statewide elections were not decided by the popular vote but by a system of units. The candidate getting the most votes in any county was assigned twice the number of units as the number of representatives from that county in the lower house of the state legislature. Because of the way that house was apportioned, this resulted in gross discrimination against the urban counties. The statute was changed while the case was pending but the county unit system was retained. Units were still assigned on a basis that favored the smaller counties. In court, the state sought to justify the system specifically as an effort "to achieve a reasonable balance as between urban and rural electoral power."

In an opinion by Justice Douglas, the Court found, first, that, in view of the state's detailed regulation of the primary, that process must be regarded as state rather than private action and hence subject to the equal protection clause. Second, it held that any person whose right to vote is impaired has standing to invoke that clause. Third, the Court found that the case was not moot because of the fact that the Democratic Committee voted to hold the 1962 primary on a popular vote basis. "/T/he voluntary abandonment of a practice does not relieve a court of adjudicating its legality, particularly where the practice is deeply rooted and long-standing. For if the case were dismissed as moot appellants would be 'free to return to /their/ old ways.'"

On the main issue, the Court noted that the problem in this case involved neither gerrymandering nor the question whether a state may have one House chosen without regard to population at all. This is "only a voting case." The Court concluded that, "Once the geographical unit for which a representative is to be chosen is designated, all who participate in the election are to have an equal vote.... The conception of political equality from the Declaration of Independence, to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, to the Fifteenth, Seventeenth, and Nineteenth Amendments can mean only one thing -- one person, one vote."

Justice Stewart, joined by Justice Clark, concurred in the opinion and the judgment of the Court, noting, however, that the case involved state-wide offices, not legislative apportionment. "Within a given constituency, there can be room for but a single constitutional rule -- one voter, one vote."

Justice Harlan, dissenting, believed that the one person, one vote ideology was constitutionally untenable, in view of the history of the Constitution. He believed that it was not "irrational for a State to conclude that a candidate for such office [of governor] should not be one whose choice lies with the numerically superior electoral strength of urban voters," or that with respect to other state-wide offices, Georgia should "assure against a predominantly 'city point of view' in the administration of the State's affairs."

IV. IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY

The Court heard and decided together two cases dealing with expatriation for draft-dodging. Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez and Rusk v. Cort, 83 S. Ct. 554. In both, the Court held unconstitutional, by 5 - 4 votes, statutes providing for automatic forfeiture of citizenship for leaving or remaining away from the country in order to avoid the draft. In Cort, two of the dissenting Justices would have held unconstitutional a provision making failure to comply with any requirement of the draft laws presumptive evidence of intent to leave the country to avoid the draft.

The first of these cases concerned Mendoza-Martinez, a native-born American who by reason of his parentage also had Mexican citizenship. In 1942, he left the United States and admittedly went to Mexico solely for the purpose of evading military service, remaining there until 1946 when he voluntarily returned to the United States. In 1947, he pleaded guilty to a charge of draft evasion, was convicted and served a sentence of a year and a day. In 1953 he was served with a warrant of arrest in deportation proceedings based on the assertion that, by remaining outside the United States to avoid military service after 1944 (when the provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act concerning expatriation of draft evaders took effect), he had lost his American citizenship.

The second case concerned Dr. Joseph Cort, a native-born American, who went to England in 1951 on a fellowship. Later that year, he was instructed to submit his passport to be invalidated except for return to the United States. He refused because, according to his affidavits, he believed he was being forced to return in order to be subpoenaed before the House Committee on Un-American Activities or to be prosecuted under the Smith Act for his membership in the Communist Party while in the United States. Thereafter, on the same grounds, he ignored a number of notices from his draft board to report for service. In May 1954, the British Home Office refused to renew his residence permit and Cort moved to Czechoslovakia where he has lived since. In 1959, he applied for a passport which was denied on the ground that he had forfeited his American citizenship by failure to report for induction and by remaining outside the country to avoid military service.

---

* The Supreme Court decided during the 1961-62 Term that Cort could bring an action under the declaratory judgment act to review the ruling of the Secretary of State that Cort had lost his citizenship by remaining abroad to avoid military service. See AJCongress Summary 1961-62, p. 20. The present case considered Cort's claim on the merits.

In both cases, the Court held, 5 - 4, that the statutes on which expatriation was based were unconstitutional.* In an opinion delivered by Justice Goldberg, the Court held the statutes invalid because "Congress has plainly employed the sanction of deprivation of nationality as a punishment - for the offense of leaving or remaining outside the country to evade military service - without affording the procedural safeguards guaranteed by the Fifth and Sixth Amendments," including notice, confrontation, compulsory process for obtaining witnesses, trial by jury and assistance of counsel.

The Court rejected the argument that the availability, after the fact of expatriation, of administrative and judicial proceedings to contest the validity of the sanction, meets the measure of due process. Since the sanction imposed was punishment (and on the basis of a detailed examination of the legislative history of this statute and its predecessor the Court determined that it was) "the procedural safeguards required as incidents of a criminal prosecution are lacking. We need go no further."

The Court concluded that, while it might be that this holding would immunize a draft evader who has left the country from suffering any penalty, since he must return to this country before he can be apprehended and tried, the "compelling answer to this is that the Bill of Rights ...[is] not to be abrogated merely because a guilty man may escape prosecution ...." Moreover, even without expatriation, the draft evader living abroad cannot assert the vast majority of his rights as an American citizen. To assert these rights, "he must return to this country, and by doing that he will subject himself to prosecution," and pay his debt. "This is what Mendoza-Martinez did [and], what Cort says he is willing to do ...."

* Before reaching the constitutional issue in the Mendoza case, the Court found (1) that the case was properly tried before a single judge rather than a statutory three-judge court and (2) that the Government was not estopped from claiming expatriation by an admission, made in earlier proceedings, that Mendoza was a citizen.

Justices Douglas and Black filed a one sentence concurring opinion in which they joined in the opinion of the Court but also expressed their view that "Congress has no power to deprive a person of the citizenship granted the native born by §1, cl. 1, of the Fourteenth Amendment."

Justice Brennan also filed a separate opinion, joining in the Court's opinion but expressing additional views. He believed that the present case was governed by Trop v. Dulles (see AJCongress Summary, 1957-58, p. 37) because here, as in that case, the claim that expatriation was necessary to implementation of a governmental power (the war power in Trop and maintenance of troop morale here) was not tenable.

Justice Stewart dissented, joined by Justice White. He said that the statute was not punitive since the disability it imposes is not for the purpose of vengeance or deterrence but is an incident to a broader regulatory objective, in this case the objective of strengthening war-time morale. He found that, under its war powers, Congress could expatriate for the purpose of "removing a corrosive influence upon the morale of a nation at war."

He believed also, however, that the administrative determination that Cort had lost his citizenship was invalid because it made use of a statutory provision which declares that failure to comply with any section of any compulsory service laws of the United States shall raise the presumption that the departure from the United States was for the purpose of evading military service. He found here an insufficient rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed. Hence, he would have ordered new proceedings in the Cort case.

Justice Harlan, with Justice Clark concurring, joined those parts of Justice Stewart's opinion leading to the conclusion that the statutes were constitutional. However, they disagreed with Justice Stewart's view that the evidentiary presumption contained in the statutes is invalid.

In Rosenberg v. Fleuti, 83 S. Ct. 1804, the Court held, 5 - 4, that a resident alien who visited Mexico for a few hours and then returned to the United States had not made an "entry" within the meaning of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 so as to subject him to deportation for a condition existing at the time of his return. The defendant was a Swiss national admitted to permanent residence in the United States in 1952. He had been here continuously except for a visit of a few hours to Mexico in 1956. In 1959 the Immigration and Naturalization Service tried to deport him on the ground that when he returned to the United States in 1956 he was subject to deportation because he had been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude. When it appeared that this deportation order was invalid (because the crime was a petty offense not encompassed by the statute), new proceedings were brought against Fleuti on the ground that at the time of the 1956 re-entry he was a homosexual, and thus an alien "afflicted with psychopathic personality."

Fleuti argued successfully in the Circuit Court that the immigration statute was unconstitutionally vague as applied to him in that homosexuality was not properly included in the statutory term "psychopathic personality." On the government's appeal, Justice Goldberg, speaking for the majority, found it unnecessary to reach this issue since he found that Fleuti's return to the United States was not an "entry" within the meaning of the statute. (This was determinative of the case, since Fleuti was concededly not excludable as a "psychopathic personality" in 1952.)

The statute defines entry as the coming of an alien to the United States from a foreign port whether voluntarily or not, except that an alien having a lawful residence in the United States will not be considered as having made an entry if his departure to a foreign port was not intended or was not voluntary. The Court found that the exception, a remedial amendment to the statute, was designed to protect an alien from the irrational hazards of unintentionally or involuntarily leaving the country and finding himself subject to deportation upon his "re-entry." The Court found no indication in the legislative history of the amendment of what Congress thought about the problem of "resident aliens who leave the country for insignificantly short periods of time." (The legislative history approved two liberal judicial interpretations of the original law, one protecting an alien who had taken a train from Buffalo to Detroit which passed through a part of Canada; the other protecting an alien whose ship was torpedoed during World War II and who, after being rescued, was taken to Cuba for a week to recuperate.) Nevertheless, the policy considerations which underlie the amendment, led the majority to conclude that in approving the two liberal decisions, Congress "could not have meant to limit the meaning of the exceptions it created... to the facts of those two cases."

Justice Clark, joined by Justices Harlan, Stewart and White, dissented on the ground that the plain language of the statute did not allow for this expanded definition of intent. Justice Clark emphasized that, while Fleuti's trip may have been brief and casual, unlike the aliens in the two cases referred to by the majority, he clearly expected to enter a foreign port. Since the Court should have but did not reach the issue as to the validity of the statute, Justice Clark dissented.*

---

* One other case may be mentioned in this section. In Schneider v. Rusk, 83 S. Ct. 621, a naturalized citizen had challenged the statute that provides that a naturalized citizen loses his nationality if he returns for three years to the country of his birth or former nationality. The suit had been dismissed by a single judge on the authority of a 1949 decision upholding the statute which the Supreme Court had refused to review. In a brief unanimous per curiam opinion, the Court said that, in view of subsequent decisions, there was now a substantial question as to the constitutionality of the statute and that therefore the case should be considered by a three-judge statutory court.

V. OTHER CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

A. Searches, Arrests, Electronic Devices and the Use of Illegally Obtained Evidence.

In Ker v. California, 83 S. Ct. 1623, a closely divided Court affirmed the conviction in the California courts of a man and his wife for illegal possession of narcotics. The police acted in this case after receiving information indicating that the Kers were dealing in marijuana. They entered the defendants' apartment silently, using a passkey obtained from the building superintendent. Walking towards the kitchen, one of the policemen saw a package of marijuana on the sink. The Kers were arrested after denying knowledge of the contents of the package and failing to answer a question about its ownership. After the arrest, the officers, proceeding without a warrant, searched the apartment and found additional marijuana which, with the marijuana on the sink, was introduced in evidence. The California court, in affirming the conviction, found that there was probable cause for the arrest, that the entry into the Kers' apartment was for the purpose of arrest and was not illegal and that, since the search was incident to a lawful arrest, it was also lawful and its fruits were therefore admissible in evidence. The defendants urged reversal, onthe basis of the 1961 decision of the Supreme Court in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643 (see AJCongress Summary 1960-61, p. 56), which held that evidence obtained in violation of federal constitutional guarantees may not be used in criminal prosecutions in state courts.

The Court voted 5 - 4 to uphold the conviction but the majority divided 4 - 1 on the basis of its action. Justice Clark, speaking also for Justices Black, Stewart and White, held, first, that the prohibition of all but "reasonable" searches and seizures in the Fourth Amendment, which applies to the federal government, is made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. He further held that "the standard of reasonableness is the same under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments...." (On this point, only Justice Harlan disagreed.) He noted that additional restraints might be applied to the federal courts under the Supreme Court's general supervisory jurisdiction, but not under the Fourth Amendment.

Second, Justice Clark reviewed the record and concluded that the police had reasonable grounds for arresting the defendants. Third, he held that the entry into the apartment without prior announcement was reasonable. Fourth, he found that the search in connection with the arrest was well within the accepted rule that "a search without warrant may be lawfully conducted if incident to a lawful arrest...."

On the third point (on which the dissenters disagreed), Justice Clark said that the constitutional guarantee normally requires that policemen, before breaking in, must disclose their identity and purpose. However, this requirement is subject to exception. Here, the police had testified that, in their experience, dealers in narcotics can and do easily dispose of incriminating evidence when threatened with arrest. This fact created "exigent circumstances" sufficient to require an exception to the usual rule.

Justice Harlan concurred in the result (thus adding the fifth vote necessary for a majority) but he disagreed with the Court's opinion. He said that searches and seizures in the Federal courts have been subject to the requirement of reasonableness contained in the Fourth Amendment, and that heretofore searches and seizures by the states have been judged "by the more flexible concept of 'fundamental' fairness...." He would have retained that distinction.

Justice Brennan, with Chief Justice Warren and Justices Douglas and Goldberg, joined the Court's opinion on the first point but disagreed on the third. They believed that even though there was probable cause by federal standards for the arrests of the Kers, "the arrests of these petitioners were nevertheless illegal, because the unannounced intrusion of the arresting officers into their apartment violated the Fourth Amemdment." Justice Brennan said that the Fourth Amendment bars the unannounced intrusion of police officers into a private home except in circumstances not present here. He viewed the exception endorsed by Justice Clark as violating the presumption of innocence since it assumed that all persons suspected of crime would engage in illegal conduct if warned of the presence of police.

In Wong Sun and James Toy v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 407, the Court decided 5 - 4 that a confession made by a narcotics suspect after a federal narcotics agent unlawfully entered his apartment could not be used against the defendant.

In 1959, federal narcotics agents in San Francisco arrested a suspect and found narcotics in his possession. The suspect said after his arrest that he had bought heroin the night before from "Blackie Toy," the proprietor of a laundry. That morning, six or seven narcotics agents went to a laundry owned by the defendant, James Toy. One Chinese agent told Toy that he was calling for laundry. Toy said that he did not open until 8 o'clock. He told the agent to come back later and started to close the door. The agent then said "I am a federal narcotics agent." Toy slammed the door and ran back down the hall through the laundry to his living quarters. The agent and the other federal officers broke open the door and arrested Toy. A search of the premises revealed no narcotics.

In his apartment, after his arrest, Toy denied having sold narcotics, but said that he knew someone named Johnny who did sell narcotics. Toy helped the agents locate Johnny Yee who surrendered some heroin, saying that it had been brought to him four days earlier by James Toy and another Chinese known as Sea Dog. Toy identified Sea Dog as defendant Wong Sun and took the agents to Wong Sun's house, where Wong Sun was arrested. A search of his premises revealed no narcotics.

A few days after their arrests, Wong Sun and James Toy were interrogated separately at the Narcotics Bureau. Bureau agents them prepared statements for Toy and Wong Sun. The accuracy of these statements was admitted, although neither statement was signed.

The narcotics statute provides that proof of possession of drugs will support a conviction unless the accused satisfactorily explains the possession. The government's evidence tending to prove possession consisted of (1) the oral statement by Toy in his bedroom at the time of his arrest; (2) the surrender of the heroin to the agents by Johnny Yee; (3) Toy's pre-trial unsigned statement; and (4) Wong Sun's pre-trial unsigned statement. These four items were admitted by the trial court in evidence over the objection that they were inadmissible as the fruits of unlawful arrest or of attendant searches. The lower court held that both arrests were illegal since not based on probable cause, but that the four items of proof were not the fruits of illegal arrests and therefore were properly admitted in evidence.

Justice Brennan speaking for the majority, said that Toy's arrest was illegal because there was not probable cause for acting without a warrant. The requirement of reliability of information on which an officer may act without a warrant is as least stringent as the requirement when a warrant is obtained. The majority concluded that no arrest warrant would have been issued on the information available to the officers at the time of Toy's arrest. The information from the original informant was not necessarily reliable and there was no certainty that James Toy was "Blackie Toy." The Court rejected the argument that any defects in the information which took the officers to Toy's laundry were remedied by events occurring after their arrival and particularly by Toy's flight down the hall.

The Court next held that Toy's declarations in his apartment must be excluded as "fruits" of a federal agent's unlawful action. It said that verbal evidence which derives "immediately from an unlawful entry and an unauthorized arrest... is no less the 'fruit' of official illegality than the more common tangible fruits of the unwarranted intrusion." The Court further held that the exclusion of the bedroom declaration required the exclusion of the narcotics taken from Yee, since the discovery of the narcotics followed from "exploitation" of the tainted declaration.

Toy's unsigned statement was thus the only proof remaining to sustain his conviction. The Court found it unnecessary to consider whether Toy's statement was also the fruit of illegal arrest. It is well settled that a confession cannot be the basis of a conviction unless it is corroborated. Won Sun's statement could not be used for corroboration because of the rule that out of court declarations made after an arrest may not be used at a trial against one of the partners in crime. Henace, as to Toy "the only possible source of corroboration is removed and his conviction must be set aside for lack of competent evidence to support it."*

The Court found that Wong Sun's arrest also was without probable cause or reasonable grounds but concluded that, since his unsigned confession was not the fruit of the arrest, it had been properly admitted. Nevertheless, the Court concluded that Wong Sun was also entitled to a new trial. For the same reason that Wong Sun's statement was incompetent to corroborate Toy's admissions, any references to Wong Sun in Toy's statement were incompetent to corroborate

---

* On the corroboration point, the Court said that it was well settled that out of court declarations made after arrest may not be used in a trial against a partner in crime. But the Court had never ruled squarely on the question presented here, whether a co-defendant's statement might serve to corroborate even where it would not be sufficient to convince. "We see no warrant for a different result as long as the rule that regulates the use of out of court statements is one of admissibility, rather than simply of weight, of the evidence."

Wong Sun's admission. Thus, the only source of corroboration for Wong Sun's confession was the heroin itself. The Court could not be certain from the record that the trial court had considered only the heroin as corroboration, and that "the scales were not tipped in favor of conviction by reliance upon the inadmissible Toy statement."

Justice Clark dissented, joined by Justices Harlan, Stewart and White. He said that the informant's knowledge was sufficiently reliable to establish probable cause for the arrest of Toy without a warrant; that even if there was no probable cause at that point, Toy's flight was "strong evidence of guilt" and that, "/i/n view of this, there is no 'poisonous tree' whose fruits we must evaluate...." Toy's declaration at the time of the arrest and the narcotics found in Lee's possession were thus admissible in evidence. As to Wong Sun, he found no grounds for the assumption that the trial judge "may" have considered Toy's confession, particularly where a federal judge, and not a jury, was the trier of the facts.

In Lopez v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1381, the Court held, over three dissents, that a revenue agent's secret electronic recording of a conversation made in the defendant's office is admissible in a federal criminal prosecution where the revenue agent himself testified and the recording served as corroboration of his testimony.

In the course of an investigation of tax evasion by a revenue agent, the defendant offered the agent a bribe, which the agent accepted and then reported to his superiors. On a subsequent visit to the defendant's place of business, the agent carried a concealed tape recorder and recorded his conversation with the defendant. At the trial for bribery, the agent testified as to the conversations and the tape recording was introduced as evidence to corroborate his testimony. The defendant argued that the tape recorded conversation was obtained in violation of his rights under the Fourth Amendment. He also challenged the testimony of the agent at his trial, saying that the agent's conversation with him was illegally "seized" since the agent gained access to his office by misrepresenting his intention to accept the bribe.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Harlan, held first that the agent could not be said to have "invaded" the defendant's office simply because the former's "apparent willingness to accept a bribe was not real." He was in the office with the defendant's consent and the only evidence obtained consisted of statements by the defendant to the agent which the defendant knew could be used against him.

On the constitutional claim relating to the recording, Justice Harlan said that this case does not involve "eavesdropping" at all since "/t/he Government did not use an electronic device to listen in on conversations it could not otherwise have heard." The recorder was used only to obtain "the most reliable evidence possible" of a conversation in which the agent was a participant and which the agent was entitled to disclose. Finally the device was not implanted by means of an "unlawful physical invasion... under circumstances which would violate the Fourth Amendment."

In addition to rejecting the constitutional claim, the Court refused to exclude this evidence in the exercise of its supervisory powers over procedures in federal courts, since "there has been no manifestly improper conduct by federal officials."

Chief Justice Warren, concurring in the result, agreed with the majority that the use of electronic devices to corroborate an agent and protect his credibility was permissible. While agreeing with the dissenters on the dangers of electronic spying he declined to support a bar on all use of such devices. He thought that the majority opinion might be taken as reaffirming On Lee v. U. S., 343 U. S. 747, in which the Court admitted as evidence a recording of a conversation between a narcotics suspect and a government informer, where the informer (who never testified himself) carried a microphone and transmitted the conversation to a narcotics agent some distance away. Like the dissenters, he thought that case wrongly decided. He believed that the present case could be distinguished from On Lee on the ground that the agent in the present case had testified to the conversation and that the tape recording was only corroborative, whereas in On Lee the recording obviated the necessity of putting the informer on the stand.

Justice Brennan dissented, joined by Justices Douglas and Goldberg. He believed that this case was rationally indistinguishable from On Lee, and that On Lee was wrongly decided and should be overruled. It should make no difference that the agent in this case testified while the informer in On Lee did not, since the tape recording was independent evidence and not merely repetitive or corroborative of human testimony. The three dissenters thought that the Court should, either under the Fourth Amendment or through the use of its supervisory power, exclude "from federal criminal trials the fruits of surreptitious electronic surveillance by federal agents."

Cleary v. Bolger, 83 S. Ct. 385, involved the question whether federal courts may use the injunction power to prevent the use of illegally obtained evidence in state court criminal proceedings. The plaintiff here was a longshoreman who was arrested by federal agents for smuggling. The agents obtained an incriminating statement from the plaintiff during an interrogation conducted in violation of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure (but not of any constitutional guaranty). A state official, Cleary, was present at the interrogation. The plaintiff was indicted for petty larceny in New York state. He sued to prevent the federal agents and Cleary from testifying to the incriminating statement. The District Court granted the injunction and only Cleary appealed. The Supreme Court held, 6 - 3, that there was no basis for the injunction against Cleary.

Justice Harlan, in the Court's opinion, stressed the traditional reluctance of federal courts to interfere with state court proceedings. While prior Supreme Court decisions upheld restraints upon the testimony of federal officials in state proceedings, they do not apply to state officials. If they give testimony in violation of state law, the convicted person can appeal the conviction to the Supreme Court but correction should not be by collateral attack. Justice Harlan also noted that there was no evidence here that Cleary was being used by the federal officials.

Justice Goldberg concurred in the result. Disagreeing with the majority, he thought that state officials might sometimes be restrained from testifying. But he would withhold such relief here because New York court decisions indicated that the state court would exclude the evidence in question.

Justice Douglas, with Chief Justice Warren concurring, dissented. He asserted that Cleary should be enjoined because he obtained his evidence "as a result of 'federal agents' violation of the Federal Rules." The Court's decision, in his view, facilitated evasion of the Rules.

Justice Brennan, again with the Chief Justice concurring, expressed agreement with Justice Douglas and added that basic principles of equity were flouted when an injunction against federal agents, properly issued, was made nugatory by failing to enjoin a state official. He also disagreed with Justice Goldberg since it was not certain that the New York courts would exclude the evidence in question or that, if they did not, the Supreme Court would reverse a conviction so obtained.

B. Self-incrimination

In Shotwell Manufacturing Company v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 448, the Court held, 6 - 3, in an opinion by Justice Harlan, that the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination was not violated by the government's use at a tax evasion trial of defendants' voluntary, though false, disclosures to the Treasury Department made under a promise of immunity from prosecution. The defendants were convicted in a federal court of attempted evasion of federal income taxes for the years 1945 and 1946. The charge was that the defendant company's tax returns for those years had not reported substantial income derived from black market sales. As a result of various procedural steps, a special hearing was held to determine whether the District Court should have suppressed certain evidence used at the trial which the defendants had furnished the government under the Treasury Department's then existing policy of voluntary disclosure. (This policy was a promise by the Treasury Department that delinquent taxpayers could escape possible criminal prosecution by disclosing their dereliction to the tax authorities before any investigation had begun.) The evidence in question consisted of tabulations showing the unreported black market income and offsetting black market payments for the purchase of raw material. These payments almost matched the black market receipts.

The District Court refused to suppress the evidence, finding that no honest voluntary disclosure had ever been made since, although the black market receipts of the company had been correctly reported, the black market expenditures for payment of supplies had been falsely over-represented and most of the receipts had in fact been pocketed by the officers of the company. The Court of Appeals affirmed and the Supreme Court granted review.

The defendants' principal claim was that the self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment barred the government's use at the trial of any of the voluntarily disclosed material. The Court agreed that the Fifth Amendment bars use of "evidence of guilt induced from a person under a governmental promise of immunity." Nevertheless, said Justice Harlan, this principle is inapplicable here, first, because of the essential character of this particular offer of immunity and, second, because of the response of the defendants to that offer. The offer presupposed at the very least that the delinquent taxpayer would make a full and honest statement. Once the defendants had decided to engage in fraud, "they must be deemed to have recognized that such offer had in effect been withdrawn as to them." Thus, the disclosure here cannot be regarded as the product of unlawful inducement.

The defendants next argued that a new trial should have been granted because the party whose transactions with the company had formed the basis of the charges in the indictment had testified falsely regarding the amount of his black market payments. The Court reviewed the evidence and found that the convictions could not be regarded as having rested on perjured testimony. The Court also rejected a number of other defenses not raising constitutional questions.

Justice Black in dissent was joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justice Douglas. He stated that the convictions should be reversed and a new trial granted because of two serious errors which denied the defendants their constitutional right to a fair trial. First, he said, the jury verdicts rested in part "on confessions obtained from the defendants by governmental promises of immunity from criminal prosecution, in violation of the Fifth Amendment." He said that the majority had used various formulas each of which in turn "lops off a significant part of the protections the Fifth Amendment has always been thought to afford." Specifically, Justice Black rejected the suggestion that a defendant's constitutional right not to be compelled to be a witness against himself must be conditioned on his coming into court with clean hands.

Justice Black also found that, since the jury's verdict of guilty in large part rested upon testimony that was thoroughly discredited by a witness in the subsequent hearing, the defendants were denied their constitutional right to a fair jury trial by the failure to grant them a new trial before a new jury which could hear this evidence in determining their guilt or innocence.

In Namet v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1151, the Court held, 7 - 2, that it was not reversible error for a prosecutor to ask two witnesses questions concerning their relationship to the defendant with the knowledge that the witnesses would invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

Namet was convicted of violating the federal wagering tax law. One of the local stores in which Namet was said to be operating a gambling ring was owned by Mr. and Mrs. Irving Kahn who, with Namet, were charged with violations of the tax laws. At Namet's trial, his counsel told the court that the Kahns would plead the privilege against self-incrimination if called as witnesses. The judge ruled that, because of their plea of guilty, the privilege was not available to them except to the extent that they might be liable to prosecution for conspiracy or bribery. The Kahns then testified, without objection, on a number of points but successfully asserted the privilege on some questions. Namet was convicted.

In an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court said that "/n/o constitutional issues of any kind are presented." He rejected the claim that reversible error was committed in permitting the government to question witnesses after it became known that they would claim their privilege.

Justice Stewart said that there was some support in lower court decisions for two theories on which the defendant might claim reversible error. The first is based on prosecutorial misconduct, occurring "when the Government makes a conscious and flagrant attempt to build its case out of inferences arising from use of the testimonial privilege." The second rests on the conclusion that "inferences from a witness' refusal to answer added critical weight to the prosecution's case in a form not subject to cross-examination and thus unfairly prejudiced the defendant." Without specifically endorsing either theory, the Court found that on neither was there reversible error since there were few claims of testimonial privilege and those few were at most "cumulative support for an inference already well established by the nonprivileged portion of the witness' testimony."

Justice Black, joined by Justice Douglas, dissented on the ground that it was error for the trial court to "permit the prosecuting attorney in the presence of the jury to ask questions which he knew the witnesses would refuse to answer on the ground of self-incrimination."

C. Confessions

In Lynumn v. Illinois, 83 S. Ct. 917, the Court unanimously set aside a conviction for the unlawful possession and sale of marijuana because of the use of an improperly obtained confession. The events in question started when the Chicago police told a man named James Zeno, who had been arrested for possession of narcotics, that they would show leniency if he "set somebody up for them." Zeno agreed to cooperate and accompanied the police officers to the defendant's apartment. Zeno went upstairs while the officers waited below. Some time later, Zeno came out of the apartment carrying a package of marijuana. The officers then arrested the defendant, who at first denied that she had sold Zeno the marijuana. However, she orally confessed making a sale after the officers repeatedly told her that, if she did not cooperate, state aid for her infant children would be cut off, her child n would be taken away from her and she would go to jail for ten years and never see her children again. At the trial, the defendant repeated her denials, and her testimony as to the circumstances of her confession was corroborated by the testimony of the police.

Justice Stewart, delivering the Court's opinion, held that use of the confession violated the constitutional requirement of due process. The confession could not be deemed the product of a rational intellect and a free will, since the defendant confessed while she was encircled in her apartment by three police officers and a felon cooperating with the police. There was no friend or advisor to whom she could turn, and she had no experience with the law which might lead her to believe that the police did not have the power to carry out their threats.

The Court also rejected the contention that the error was harmless in light of other evidence of the defendant's guilt. The Court has uniformly held that, even if there is sufficient evidence apart from the coerced confession to support a judgment of conviction, the admission of the confession in evidence vitiates the judgment.

In a second case dealing with confessions, Haynes v. Washington, 83 S. Ct. 1336, the Court divided 5 - 4 in reversing a conviction based on a confession signed after a robbery defendant had been held incommunicado for 16 hours, during which time he was told that he could not call his wife or obtain an attorney unless he cooperated. The defendant, who was charged with robbing a gas station, had orally admitted the crime immediately after his arrest. Nevertheless he was held incommunicado while the police obtained a signed confession from him and tried to obtain a second. It was the use of the signed confession that the Court found to require reversal.

Speaking for the majority, Justice Goldberg reviewed the evidence and found that the confession was obtained "in an atmosphere of substantial coercion and inducement created by statements and actions of state authorities" and that the "totality of circumstances" evidenced "an involuntary written admission of guilt." The Court cautioned that it did not mean to suggest that "all interrogation of witnesses and suspects is impermissible." The difficult problem here was in determining the effect of the "psychologically coercive pressures and inducements on the mind and will of an accused."

Justice Goldberg took occasion to note that the coercion used here was only to complete a case in which there was already ample evidence of guilt. He went on: "There is no reasonable or rational basis for claiming that the oppressive and unfair methods utilized were in any way essential to the detection or solution of the crime or to the protection of the public."

Justice Clark, in a dissent joined by Justices Harlan, Stewart and White, noted that special factors present in other psychologically coerced confession cases, such as youth or sub-normal intelligence, were absent in this case. From the absence of these special factors and of evidence of "an atmosphere tending to subvert" the defendant's "rationality and free will," he concluded that Haynes' confession was not involuntary.

D. Double Jeopardy.

In Downum v. United States, 83 S. Ct. 1033, the Court held, 5 - 4, that a federal criminal defendant was placed in double jeopardy by a trial held two days after the first jury was discharged because of the absence of a key prosecution witness. The defendant had been indicted on six counts of stealing checks from the mail and forging and passing them. After a jury was impanelled, the prosecutor discovered that a key witness on two of the six counts in the indictment was missing. After the prosecution asked that the jury be discharged because the witness was not present, the defendant moved that the two counts be dismissed for want of prosecution and that the trial continue on the other counts. This motion was denied and the judge discharged the first jury, which had been sworn but had not heard any evidence. Two days later a second jury was impaneled and the defendant was convicted after his plea of double jeopardy was rejected.

Justice Douglas said that there are times when "the valued right of a defendant to have his trial completed by the particular tribunal summoned to sit in judgment on him" may be subordinated to the public interest but only "when there is an imperious necessity to do so." Each case must be determined on its own facts. The Court would not say that the absence of witnesses can never justify the discontinuance of a trial. In this case, however, the Court held that, in impaneling the jury without first determining whether or not a necessary witness was present, the District Attorney simply took the chance of not being certain that he had enough evidence to convict. There is no difference in principle between this situation and the one in which the prosecuting attorney discovers that his evidence is insufficient only after calling several witnesses. Both cases are within the double jeopardy rule.

Justice Clark, joined by Justices Harlan, Stewart and White, dissented. He stressed that the two day delay did not cause the defendant any harrassment or expense, or in any way prejudice him. He believed that the action of the prosecutor did not deprive the defendant of any rights and that the ends of justice required that the defendant be tried rather than set free "because of the harmless oversight of the prosecutor."

E. Right to Counsel.

A 20-year old precedent was overruled in Gideon v. Wainwright, 83 S. Ct. 792, when a unanimous Court held that the failure of a state to provide counsel in a non-capital criminal case deprived the indigent defendant of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendant was charged with breaking and entering, which is a felony under Florida law. His request for counsel having been denied, he conducted his own defense as well as could be expected from a layman. Nevertheless, he was convicted.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Black noted that these facts were strikingly similar to those in Betts v. Brady, 316 U. S. 455 (1942) in which the Court, by a vote of 6 - 3, refused to reverse a state court conviction. It there held that the circumstances were not "so offensive to the common and fundamental ideas of fairness" as to constitute a denial of due process as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court here decided that Betts v. Brady should be overruled.*

The Court first considered the provisions of the Sixth Amendment that in "all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to have the Assistance of Counsel ...." This has been construed to mean that in the federal courts counsel must be supplied for indigent defendants unless the right is competently and intelligently waived. Gideon urged, as Betts had before him, that this right was extended to indigent defendants in state courts by the Fourteenth Amendment. In response to this, the Court had said in Betts that the Sixth Amendment laid down no rule for the conduct of the states, and that the constraint upon the national courts expressed in the Sixth Amendment was not so fundamental and essential to a fair trial that it is made obligatory upon the states by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Justice Black accepted the assumption of Betts that a provision of the Bill of Rights which is fundamental to a fair trial is made obligatory upon the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. "We think the Court in Betts was wrong, however, in concluding that the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of counsel is not one of these fundamental rights." He noted that, ten years before Betts, the Court had held that the right to counsel was imposed on the states in capital cases. In view of the general and unequivocal language of the Court in that case regarding the right to counsel, he suggested that the Betts court had made "an abrupt break with its own well-considered precedents." In returning to these old precedents,

* Only two members of the present Court were on the Court that decided Betts and both of these, Justices Black and Douglas, dissented at that time.

"we but restore constitutional principles established to achieve a fair system of justice."*

Justice Harlan, concurring, agreed that Betts v. Brady should be overruled but suggested that it was not as unfounded a decision as the Court now considered it. He noted that it was not until 1962 that it was squarely held that counsel must be assigned in all capital cases and that, before that, some additional "special circumstances" had to be shown, such as the defendant's youth or ignorance. Now the Court had come to recognize "that the mere existence of a serious criminal charge constituted in itself special circumstances requiring the services of counsel at trial." Justice Harlan concluded that he did not read the present decision as holding that the Fourteenth Amendment "incorporates" the Sixth Amendment as such.

Justice Douglas, concurring, reviewed the relation between the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment. "Since the adoption of that Amendment, ten Justices /including Justices Douglas and Black of the present Court/ have felt that it protects from infringement by the States the privileges, protections, and safeguards granted by the Bill of Rights." He noted that this view "has never commanded a Court" but stressed that since constitutional questions are always open "what we do today does not foreclose the matter." He noted that Justice Harlan's view "that a guarantee of the Bill of Rights that is made applicable to the States by reason of the Fourteenth Amendment is a lesser version of that same guarantee as applied to the Federal Government ... has not prevailed" and concluded that "rights protected against state invasion by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment are not watered down versions of what the Bill of Rights guarantees."

* The Court noted that, while Florida was supported by two other states in urging reaffirmance of Betts, 22 other states had urged reversal.

Justice Clark, concurring, concluded that the Constitution did not provide a distinction between capital and non-capital crimes and that the Fourteenth Amendment "requires due process of law for the deprival of 'liberty' just as for deprival of 'life', and there cannot constitutionally be a difference in the quality of the process based merely upon a supposed difference in the sanction involved."

In White v. Maryland, 83 S. Ct. 1050, the Court said, in a brief unanimous per curiam opinion, that the absence of counsel vitiated the conviction of a defendant who entered a guilty plea at a preliminary hearing, even though it was not necessary that a plea be entered at that time. At the preliminary hearing shortly after his arrest, at which time he was not represented by counsel, the defendant pleaded guilty to a charge of murder. Subsequently, at a proceeding called "arraignment," the defendant, now aided by court-appointed counsel, changed his plea to "not guilty" and "not guilty by reason of insanity." Nevertheless, his earlier plea of guilty was introduced as evidence at his trial. He was convicted and sentenced to death.

The Court noted that last year, in Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U. S. 52 (see AJCongress Summary 1961-1962, p. 39), it had held that failure to provide counsel at an Alabama arraignment required reversal of a conviction, whether or not it was shown that the defendant was actually prejudiced by the lack of counsel. In this case, the Court said, "whatever may be the normal function of the 'preliminary hearing' under Maryland law," it was just as "critical" as the arraignment in the Hamilton case. "Only the presence of counsel could have enabled this accused to know all the defenses available to him and to plead intelligently."

The right to counsel at a later stage in criminal proceedings was involved in Douglas v. California, 83 S. Ct. 814. There, two defendants who had been convicted of 13 felonies asked to have counsel assigned in order to take an appeal. California statutes provide that state appellate courts, on receiving such a request, may make "an independent investigation of the record and determine whether it would be of advantage to the defendant or helpful to the appellate court to have counsel appointed ...." Here, the California appellate court examined the record pursuant to the statutes and denied the request for assigned counsel. The Supreme Court, voting 6 - 3, found the California procedure inadequate.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Douglas emphasized that the right to counsel on a first appeal should not be determined by whether a person can afford counsel. Under the California provision, if a person can pay, the appellate court passes on his case with the benefit of written briefs and oral argument by counsel. If he cannot, the appellate court is forced to prejudge the merits before it can even determine whether counsel should be provided. The Court concluded that when "an indigent is forced to run this gantlet of a preliminary showing of merit, the right to appeal does not comport with fair procedure ...."

Justice Harlan, in a dissent joined by Justice Stewart, stated that the application of the equal protection clause to cases like the present one "can lead only to mischievous results." He argued that the equal protection clause does not impose upon the states "an affirmative duty to lift the handicaps flowing from differences in economic circumstances."

Justice Clark, dissenting, argued that the appointment of counsel here would have been "utter extravagance and a waste of the State's funds," required neither by the due process nor the equal protection clauses of the Constitution. He pointed out that the Supreme Court's own procedures provide less protection for indigents than California's, and concluded "People who live in glass houses had best not throw stones."

F. Right of Indigents to Free Transcript of Testimony.

An issue closely related to the right of indigents to counsel is their right to have the state pay for the preparation of a transcript of their trial for purposes of appeal.

In Lane v. Brown, 83 S. Ct. 768, a unanimous Court invalidated an Indiana law requiring the approval of the Public Defender before an indigent criminal defendant could obtain, without cost, the transcript of his trial necessary to appeal in the state courts. The defendant in this case was an indigent under sentence of death. His original conviction had been appealed unsuccessfully. He then started a new proceeding, claiming denial of constitutional rights. This collateral proceeding was dismissed by a state court.

In order to appeal further, the defendant required a transcript of his trial which, under the Indiana Public Defender Act, only the Public Defender can request on behalf of an indigent. In this case, the Public Defender refused to request the transcript because he believed that an appeal would be unsuccessful. When the defendant's appeal in that proceeding failed, he started this habeas corpus action in a federal court.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Stewart said that the "upshot is that a person with sufficient funds can appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Indiana from the denial of a writ of error ..., but an indigent can, at the will of the Public Defender, be entirely cut off from any appeal at all." The Court held that this case was clearly governed by an earlier decision holding that a state which had an appeals system that made trial transcripts available to those who could afford them was required to furnish "adequate and effective appellate review" to indigents. The Indiana provision, the Court said, confers "upon a state officer outside the judicial system power to take from an indigent all hope of any appeal at all." The Court held that it made no difference that this proceeding was a collateral attack and that Indiana law gave indigents equal treatment during their direct appeals from convictions.

The defendant was ordered discharged from custody unless within a reasonable time Indiana provides him an appeal on the merits to the Supreme Court of Indiana from the denial of the writ of error.

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice Clark, concurred in the decision to remand but would have given different instructions. He agreed that it was unconstitutional to foreclose an indigent from appealing by the unreviewable discretion of the Public Defender. However, he said that, if judicial review of the decision of the Public Defender had been available, he would have voted to sustain the conviction. Accordingly, he would have instructed the lower court to discharge the prisoner "only if the Indiana Supreme Court fails, within a reasonable time, to accord him a review of the Public Defender's decision not to appeal...."

In Draper v. Washington, 83 S. Ct. 774, the Supreme Court held, 5 - 4, that the Washington rules governing the provision of transcripts to indigent defendants for the purposes of appeal, as applied in this case, deprived the defendants of due process of law. The indigent defendants here, who had court appointed counsel, were convicted of robbery. Their motion for a new trial was denied and, now acting for themselves, they filed notices of appeal and requested the preparation of trial transcripts at state expense. The trial judge reviewed the defendants' request and their specific claims of error, as well as the prosecutor's arguments and summary of the evidence (refuting each of the defendants' claims), and concluded that the assignments of error were "patently frivolous." The requests for transcripts were therefore denied. Attached to the trial judge's order were findings of fact, which did not describe the evidence upon which they were based. The Supreme Court of Washington, basing its conclusions solely on the record of the hearing on the request for a transcript (and not on the record of the jury trial), held that the trial court had properly found the appeals frivolous.

In an opinion by Justice Goldberg, the Court first noted that a state need not purchase a stenographic transcript of a trial in every case where the defendant cannot afford to pay for a transcript. The requirement is that "the State is to provide the indigent as adequate and effective an appellate review as that given appellants with funds...." The Court found that, under the Washington rules, an indigent defendant needing a transcript could get it only "if the judge who has presided at his trial and has already overruled his motion for a new trial as well as his objections... finds that these contentions, upon which he has already ruled, are not frivolous." Then, Justice Goldberg continued, the "predictable finding of frivolity" is subject to review without direct examination of what occurred at the trial, but only of what the parties argued at the hearing and what the judge recalled and concluded about what happened at the trial. The Court held that this was an "inadequate substitute for the full appellate review available to non-indigents in Washington."

Justice White dissented, joined by Justices Clark, Harlan and Stewart. He asserted that the record placed before the Supreme Court of Washington was entirely satisfactory and contained no constitutional infirmity. Specifically, he regarded the description of the evidence in narrative form in the prosecuting attorney's affidavit as sufficient basis for the state Supreme Court's action.

A different problem was involved in Norvell v. Illinois, 83 S. Ct. 1366, where the trial transcript sought by the indigent was unavailable because of the death of the court reporter. The defendant in this case was convicted of murder in 1941 and at that time tried to get a transcript. Because he was indigent, he was unable to pay for a transcript and so did not obtain it. Although represented by counsel, he did not pursue the appeal. In 1956, the Supreme Court decided Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U. S. 12, holding that "it was a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to deprive a person because of his indigency of any rights of appeal afforded all other convicted defendants." The Supreme Court of Illinois then adopted a rule by which the state provided a free trial transcript to every convicted indigent, whether convicted before or after the Griffin decision. It further provided that, where it is impossible to furnish a transcript, the court shall deny the petition for a free transcript. When Norvell petitioned for a transcript under this rule, it was discovered that the official court reporter had died some years earlier and no one could read his shorthand notes. Accordingly, Norvell's motion for a new trial was denied.

The Supreme Court affirmed the denial by a vote of 7 - 2. In an opinion by Justice Douglas, the Court said that the state may make rough accommodations in dealing with the equal protection clause and that it need not achieve "exact equality."

Justice Harlan concurred in the result without opinion.

Justice Goldberg, joined by Justice Stewart, dissented on the ground that the Court had unnecessarily anticipated and resolved difficult constitutional questions. The Illinois court, he said, acted on the assumption that Griffin v. Illinois "operated prospectively, and not retroactively, in the sense that it invalidated only 'existing financial barriers' to appeal." Given this view, it was unnecessary for the Illinois court to consider whether a defendant who could not obtain a transcript because of his indigency in 1941 was at that time deprived of his constitutional rights. Since the Illinois court was mistaken in its basic assumption, Justice Goldberg would have remanded the case for further consideration.

G. Due Process and Equal Protection

In Rideau v. Louisiana, 83 S. Ct. 1417, the Court held, 7 - 2, that the failure to grant a motion for change of venue constituted a denial of due process where a film showing the defendant confessing to the sheriff was shown on television three days in a row and was seen by thousands of persons in the county in which the trial was held, and where three persons who had seen the film served on the jury which convicted the defendant of murder. In an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court said that "it was a denial of due process of law to refuse the request for a change of venue, after the people of Calcasieu Parish had been exposed repeatedly and in depth to the spectacle of Rideau personally confessing in detail to the crimes with which he was later to be charged." This spectacle "in a very real sense was Rideau's trial..." and he pleaded guilty without the benefit of counsel. The Court concluded that it was not necessary to look into the details of the examination of the jurors or the fact that the judges had denied Rideau's request that the three jurors who had seen the film be removed for cause.

Justice Clark dissented, joined by Justice Harlan. He said, first, that he believed that law enforcement officers should not cooperate in "activities which tend to make more difficult the achievement of impartial justice." Therefore, if the case had arisen in the federal courts (over which the Supreme Court exercises supervisory powers), he would have voted to upset the conviction. However, he said, there is a significant difference between matters within the "scope of our supervisory power and matters which reach the level of constitutional dimension." He said that the majority had failed to establish "any substantial nexus" between the televised interview and the defendants' trial almost two months later. He did not find that the material had fatally affected the trial by entering the courtroom "indelibly embedded in the minds of the jurors."

In Brady v. Maryland, 83 S. Ct. 1194, the defendant and a companion were found guilty of first degree murder and sentenced to death. Prior to the trial, the defendant's lawyer asked permission to examine the companion's out of court statements. Several of these were shown to him but one, in which the companion admitted the actual homicide, was withheld. Because of this, the state court granted defendant a new trial, limited, however, to the question of punishment (which the jury decides under Maryland law). The defendant asked the Supreme Court to reverse on the ground that he should have been given a new trial on the question of guilt as well. The Court rejected this plea, voting 7 - 2.

Justice Douglas, in his opinion for the Court, first held broadly that, "the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution." Turning to the question raised here, the Court noted that the Maryland court had found that nothing in the suppressed confession "could have reduced the appellant Brady's offense below murder in the first degree." It read that statement as a ruling that the confession was inadmissible on the question of guilt or innocence.

The majority concluded that "a sporting theory of justice" might assume that if the confession had been used in the first trial the jury might have ignored the ruling that it was inadmissible on the issue of guilt. However, "we cannot raise that trial strategy to the dignity of a constitutional right and say that the deprival of this defendant of that sporting chance... denies him due process or violates the Equal Protection Clause...."

In a separate concurring opinion, Justice White said that the only question before the Court was the equal protection question and that he concurred in the Court's disposition of that point. He regarded the Court's holding that suppression of the confession violated the due process clause as unnecessary to the decision and therefore "wholly advisory." He said he "would not case in constitutional form a broad rule of criminal discovery."

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice Black, dissented. He disagreed with the majority's interpretation of the Maryland court's ruling and noted that, since the Maryland constitution makes the jury the judge of the law as well as the facts, there was an open question of state law as to whether the jury could have considered the question of guilt. He would have remanded the case to the state courts for resolution of that question.*

H. Habeas Corpus.

The power of federal District Courts to review state court criminal proceedings in habeas corpus proceedings was broadly viewed in three decisions during the past term.

In Fay v. Noia, 83 S. Ct. 822, the Court held, 6 - 3, that a defendant may be granted habeas corpus relief from a state conviction obtained in violation of the Constitution, even though he allowed the time for a direct appeal to lapse without seeking review of his conviction by a state appellate court. In 1942, Noia and two others were convicted in New York of a murder committed in the course of a robbery. The other two defendants appealed their convictions in

---

* A decision having possible wide implications for the assertion of constitutional rights generally was issued in Willner v. Committee on Character and Fitness, 83. S. Ct. 1175. There the Court held, 7 - 2, that an applicant who had passed the written examination for admission to the New York bar but who was refused admission because he failed to pass the character examination, was denied due process since he was not given a hearing before either the Character Committee or the Courts on charges filed against him. Justice Douglas, in the Court's opinion, said that the requirements of due process must be met before the state can exclude a person from the practice of law, that "procedural due process often requires confrontation and cross-examination of those whose word deprives a person of his livelihood," and that "the need for confrontation is a necessary conclusion from the requirements of due process in a situation such as this." Justices Harlan and Clark dissented on the ground that the constitutional issue was not properly presented.

the New York courts. These appeals were unsuccessful at the time. However, subsequent state court proceedings resulted in the release of these defendants on findings that their confessions had been coerced. Noia's confession was also admittedly coerced but the same relief was not available to him, under New York law, because of his original failure to appeal. A separate effort to obtain relief by a coram nobis proceeding in the state courts was rejected for the same reason.

In federal habeas corpus proceedings, the lower court refused to grant relief under the federal habeas corpus statute because the state court's denial of relief rested on an adequate non-federal ground. The Circuit Court reversed and ordered that Noia be discharged from custody unless given a new trial. The Supreme Court affirmed.

After an extended discussion of the history of the writ of habeas corpus,* a history "inextricably intertwined with the growth of fundamental rights of personal liberty," Justice Brennan, speaking for the majority, held that "Federal courts have power under the federal habeas statute to grant relief despite the applicant's failure to have pursued a state remedy not available to him at the time he applies" for habeas corpus. The question here was whether this type of case was governed by the doctrine that the Supreme Court will not directly review a case involving a federal question where it is shown that the state decision rested upon an adequate and independent state ground. Justice Brennan rejected the argument that, because the state law barred Noia from obtaining relief in the federal courts by appeal, he was therefore barred from relief by way of habeas corpus.*

* The Court noted, inter alia, that the present broad habeas corpus statute was adopted in 1867, during the Reconstruction Period, and "seems plainly to have been designed to furnish a method additional to and independent of direct Supreme Court review of state court decisions for the vindication of the new constitutional guarantees."

It was also argued that a state prisoner who forfeits his opportunity to vindicate federal rights in a state court has been given due process and hence is not restrained contrary to the Constitution. The Court said that the due process concept embraces "the right not to be convicted upon evidence which includes one's coerced confession."

The Court noted that a limitation on the assumption of jurisdiction would certainly be warranted in the case of a defendant who has deliberately sought to subvert or evade the orderly adjudication of his federal defenses in the state courts and said that the federal courts have discretion to deny relief under these circumstances. But "this grant of discretion is not to be interpreted as a permission to introduce legal fictions into federal habeas corpus." The Court concluded that "no just and humane legal system can tolerate a result" whereby Noia's co-defendants are at liberty because their confessions were found to have been coerced, yet Noia, whose confession was also coerced, remains in jail for life.

Justice Harlan filed a dissent in which Justices Clark and Stewart joined. He said that the decision, with its "abrupt break with the past" was "one of the most disquieting that the Court has rendered in a long time." He believed that federal courts had "no power, statutory or constitutional,..." to release Noia from state detention because "his custody by New York does not violate any federal rights, since it is pursuant to a conviction whose validity rests upon an adequate and independent state ground which the federal courts are required to respect."

---

* The Court referred to an earlier decision holding that a federal habeas corpus proceeding was barred if the petitioner had failed to ask the Supreme Court for review of the state court action denying relief. Although that rule was not applicable here, because Noia had asked for such review (unsuccessfully), the Court said that the rule was necessarily overruled by its decision in this case.

Justice Clark, dissenting in a separate opinion, agreed that Noia's incarceration rested upon an adequate and independent state ground. He believed that the decision would result in a rash of new applications from state prisoners and that the influx would result in burying meritorious applications in a flood of worthless ones.

In Townsend v. Sain, 83 S. Ct. 745, the Court ruled, 5 - 4, that a District Court had erred in dismissing a habeas corpus petition without holding a new hearing to determine whether a confession had been obtained by coercion. In 1955, Townsend was tried for murder in Illinois. At his trial, the Public Defender objected to the introduction of his confession on the ground that it was coerced. After a preliminary hearing had been held, the confession was admitted, but the judge charged the jury that they might disregard it if they found it involuntary. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. After thoroughly exhausting his state remedies, Townsend petitioned for habeas corpus in the federal courts. The theory of the application was that the petitioner, a narcotics addict, had been injected with a drug which was, in effect, a truth serum and that as a result of this injection he had confessed the crime. His petition was denied. The Supreme Court vacated the judgment and remanded the case for a decision as to whether a full evidentiary hearing was required. On the remand, the District Court found that "justice would not be served by ordering a full hearing." On appeal, the Circuit Court concluded that on habeas corpus the District Court's inquiry was correctly limited to a study of the undisputed portions of the record and that these portions here showed no deprivation of constitutional rights. The Supreme Court granted review.

Chief Justice Warren, for the Court, said that the test governing the admissibility of confessions was whether the confession was the product of a rational intellect and a free will. "It is difficult to imagine a situation in which a confession would be less the product of a free intellect, less voluntary, than when brought about by a drug having the effect of a truth serum." Thus, the habeas corpus petition alleged a deprivation of constitutional rights.

The question before the Court then became whether the District Court was required to hold a hearing to ascertain the facts on which the constitutional claim was contested or whether it could resolve the issues on the basis of the record made in the state court. The Court held, first, that there was no question that the District Court had power to hold such a hearing. Second, it found that a new hearing was required unless the state-court trier of fact has after a full hearing reliably found the relevant facts. It then discussed in detail the standards to be applied in determining whether a new trial was necessary. Applying those standards here, the Court concluded that Townsend should have been granted an evidentiary hearing in the District Court.

Justice Goldberg, concurring, joined in the opinion and judgment of the majority and expressed specific disagreement with Justice Stewart's dissenting opinion. He rejected Justice Stewart's criticism of the detailed articulation of standards to govern the grant of evidentiary hearing, saying that it was "an appropriate exercise of this Court's adjudicatory obligations."

Justice Stewart's dissenting opinion was supported by Justices Clark, Harlan and White. He said that he agreed that a confession induced by drugs is constitutionally inadmissible, that the Circuit Court used an erroneous standard in limiting its inquiry to the undisputed portions of the record, and that where an applicant for a writ of habeas corpus alleges facts which, if true, would entitle him to relief, the federal court has the power to try the facts again. However, applying those principles, he would not have ordered a new trial, since the record showed that the Illinois courts had properly passed on the petitioner's claim. In addition he disapproved the Court's detailed statement of standards because it would tend to be applied too rigidly.

In Jones v. Cunningham, 83 S. Ct. 373, a unanimous Court held that a state prisoner who had been placed on parole was "in custody" within the meaning of a federal statute giving the District Courts jurisdiction to grant a writ of habeas corpus to a prisoner "in custody in violation of the Constitution... of the United States." The petitionor was here challenging an earlier conviction in Virginia on the ground that his federal constitutional right to counsel had been denied. While an appeal in his habeas corpus action was pending in the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, he was paroled in the "custody and control" of the Vriginia Parole Board, which placed numerous restrictions on his conduct. Thus, he was required to obtain the permission of his parole officer to leave the community or to own or operate a car. He was also required to make monthly reports to his officer and to follow the officer's instructions and advice. The Circuit Court directed dismissal of the habeas corpus petition on the ground that the Parole Board did not have physical custody of the petitionor.

In an opinion by Justice Black, the Court reviewed the use of habeas corpus, both in England and in this country, in situations in which there was no close physical confinement. Justice Black concluded that there can be no doubt that, "besides physical imprisonment, there are other restraints on a man's liberty, restraints not shared by the public generally, which have been thought sufficient in the English-speaking world to support the issuance of habeas corpus." Habeas corpus was found to be appropriate here because "the custody and control of the Parole Board involves significant restraints" on the petitioner's liberty. The Court added that it was not relevant that these restrictions may be desirable and important facets of the rehabilitative process. The restraints themselves "are enough to invoke the help of the great writ."

ANALYSIS OF THE VOTES OF THE INDIVIDUAL JUSTICES

The Tables below present the votes of the individual Justices during the 1962-63 Term in the civil rights and civil liberties cases described above, and certain cumulative material for the last six Terms. The 42 cases covered here are those bearing numbers in the Table of Contents.

Each vote is recorded as being favorable (F) or unfavorable (U) to the person claiming a constitutional or other civil right. In some cases where different grounds were advanced for favoring the asserted right, FB indicates a favorable vote on broad grounds and FN a favorable vote on narrow grounds. We believe that this method of classification, based on whether the person asserting the right was favored, is relatively objective. It is not intended to embody any assumption that the person asserting that his rights were infringed was necessarily correct.

Table I gives the Court's disposition of the 42 cases covered here, divided into five categories. Table II gives the votes of the individual Justices in those cases. Tables III and IV cumulate the material in the first two Tables for the last six Terms of the Court.

Table I shows that the Court is still deciding a majority of the civil rights and civil liberties cases that come before it favorably to the asserted right. In fact, during the past Term, the proportion of favorable decisions was the highest that it has been in the six Terms covered by these reports. Of the 42 cases during the last Term, 34 were decided favorably and eight unfavorably. During the 1961-62 Term, 22 of 28 were decided favorably; during the 1960-61 Term, only 27 out of 50 were decided favorably. For the six-year period, as shown in Table III, the figures are 162 decided favorably and 93 decided unfavorably.

Table II shows the votes of the individual Justices during the past Term. It reveals clearly that there has been a significant change in the line-up of the Court. During the preceding Terms there had been a clear division between a conservative bloc of five (Justices Frankfurter, Clark, Harlan, Whittaker and Stewart) and a liberal bloc of four (Chief Justice Warren and Justices Black, Douglas and Brennan). Two members of the conservative bloc, Justices Frankfurter and Whittaker, have now been replaced by Justices White and Goldberg. On the record of the 1962-63 Term, it is clear that Justice White has lined up with the three remaining conservatives but that Justice Goldberg has cast his votes most often with the liberals, thus giving them a majority on the Court. The Justices are listed in Table II in the order of the proportion of the favorable and unfavorable votes during the last Term. There is a clear, sharp break between the first five and the last four.

The pattern is far from perfect and voting is certainly not automatic. In a number of cases, individual Justices shifted from one side to the other. Yet the conclusion that there are two blocs is well supported by the fact that eleven of the 42 cases covered here were decided by 5 - 4 votes and that all but one of these showed the liberal majority of five voting against the conservative group of four.

The division between the Court is further shown by a feature that has been conspicuous for a number of years. If the assumed polarity of the Court were false, one would see liberal Justices voting unfavorably in the same cases in which conservative Justices voted favorably. In civil rights and civil liberties cases that rarely happens. During the past Term it occurred only twice (in Norvell and Brady). It did not happen at all during the 1961-62 Term and it happened only twice in 1960-61 and once in 1959-60.

It should be emphasized, however, that in the 1962-63 Term the division in the Court did not manifest itself in the cases dealing with pressing national issues, such as racial equality and church-state separation. As we have noted in the Introduction, all of the major cases were decided by unanimous or near unanimous votes, a remarkable development indicating that the United States Supreme Court today is more firmly united than ever before in its role as the great defender of the basic freedoms of the American people. This unanimity in the Court can be explained, in part at least, by the fact that relatively few cases involving internal security came before it during the 1962-63 Term. In recent years, such cases have been the major source of division within the Court on constitutional issues.

The pattern of unanimity or near unanimity in civil rights cases, which has prevailed with only a brief interruption since the public school desegregation decisions of 1954, was revealed again this year, as may be seen in Table V. It shows the votes of the Justices in the nine civil rights cases decided during the Term. In six, the Court was unanimous and in two more the Court split 8 - 1, with the dissenter, Justice Harlan, agreeing with the Court that the convictions in question should be reversed. In the ninth case, the vote was 8 - 1, with Justice Harlan again dissenting.

There were three internal security cases decided during the year, as compared with five in the 1961-62 Term and sixteen in the 1960-61 Term. As shown in Table VI, this is an area in which the division of the Court into conservative and liberal wings is usually shown clearly. This year was no exception, despite the small number of cases. Two of the three cases (Yellin and Gastelum) were decided favorably by 5 - 4 votes, following the present liberal-conservative lineup. The third (Wheeldin) was decided unfavorably, 3 - 6, with Justices Douglas and Goldberg joining the conservative bloc.

In the area of immigration and nationality, the polarity of the Court appears in all three cases. Two cases (Mendoza and Rosenberg) were decided favorably by votes of 5 - 4. In the third case (Cort), the vote was 7 - 2, but two of the favorable votes came from Justices White and Stewart who disagreed with the liberal group and based their favorable votes on narrow grounds. (The votes in the cases affecting immigration and nationality are also given in Table VI.).

The seven cases dealing with freedom of expression listed in Table VII, cover a wide range of topics - freedom of religion, the press, speech and association as well as voting. All were decided favorably and only one (Gibson) was decided by a close division of 5 - 4.

Twenty cases are listed in Table VIII, Other Criminal Proceedings. It is in this category that all but one of the Court's unfavorable decisions were issued. Thirteen of the twenty cases, however, were decided favorably.

With the liberal conservative lineup of the Court changed this year from 4 - 5 to 5 - 4, cases were decided unfavorably to the asserted right only when there was a defection from the liberal side. The only case decided unfavorably by a 5 - 4 vote was Ker, in which Justice Black cast the swing vote. Altogether, aside from the two atypical decisions in which there was a mutual crossover (Norvell and Brady), the conservative bloc was joined by Justice Goldberg four times, Justices Black three times, Chief Justice Warren and Justice Brennan twice and Justice Douglas once. Aside from the eleven cases that were decided favorably by a unanimous vote, the liberal bloc was joined by Justice White twelve times, Justice Stewart nine times, Justice Clark seven times and Justice Harlan twice.

The proportion of unanimous decisions this year was relatively low, 13 out of 42 (31%). In previous Terms it has been 11 out of 28 (39%), in 1962-63, 15 out of 50 (30%) in 1960-61, and 14 out of 35 (40%) in 1959-60.

TABLE I.

DISPOSITION OF CASES BY COURT

1962-1963

| | Favor-able | Unfavor-able | Total |
|---|---|---|---|
| Civil Rights | 9 | 0 | 9 |
| Internal Security | 2 | 1 | 3 |
| Freedom of Expression | 7 | 0 | 7 |
| Immigration and Nationality | 3 | 0 | 3 |
| Other Criminal Proceedings | 13 | 7 | 20 |
| TOTAL | 34 | 8 | 42 |

TABLE II.

TOTAL VOTES OF JUSTICES

1962-1963

| | Favorable Broad | Favorable Narrow | Favor-able | Favorable Total | Unfavor-able | Not Partic-ipating |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Douglas | 5 | 0 | 34 | 39 | 3 | 0 |
| Black | 3 | 0 | 35 | 38 | 4 | 0 |
| Warren | 0 | 0 | 38 | 38 | 4 | 0 |
| Brennan | 0 | 0 | 38 | 38 | 4 | 0 |
| Goldberg | 0 | 0 | 37 | 37 | 5 | 0 |
| White | 0 | 1 | 22 | 23 | 19 | 0 |
| Stewart | 0 | 1 | 20 | 21 | 21 | 0 |
| Clark | 0 | 2 | 16 | 18 | 24 | 0 |
| Harlan | 0 | 4 | 12 | 16 | 26 | 0 |

TABLE III.

DISPOSITION OF CASES BY COURT

CUMULATIVE: 1957-1963

| | Favorable | Unfavorable | Total |
|---|---|---|---|
| Civil Rights | 30 | 4 | 34 |
| Internal Security | 29 | 24 | 53 |
| Freedom of Expression | 30 | 8 | 38 |
| Immigration and Nationality | 8 | 6 | 14 |
| Other Criminal Proceedings | 65 | 51 | 116 |
| TOTAL | 162 | 93 | 255 |

TABLE IV.

TOTAL VOTES OF JUSTICES

CUMULATIVE: 1957-1963

| | Favorable Broad | Favorable Narrow | Favorable | Favorable Total | Unfavorable | Not Participating |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Douglas | 49 | 8 | 186 | 243 | 12 | 0 |
| Black | 36 | 12 | 181 | 229 | 25 | 1 |
| Warren | 19 | 16 | 184 | 219 | 31 | 5 |
| Brennan | 12 | 26 | 174 | 212 | 41 | 2 |
| Goldberg | 0 | 0 | 37 | 37 | 5 | 0 |
| White | 0 | 1 | 24 | 25 | 20 | 13 |
| Stewart | 5 | 14 | 87 | 106 | 88 | 4 |
| Harlan | 5 | 23 | 84 | 112 | 140 | 3 |
| Clark | 2 | 17 | 80 | 99 | 156 | 0 |

TABLE V.

VOTES IN CIVIL RIGHTS CASES: 1962-1963

| Cases | *Court | Douglas | Black | Warren | Brennan | Goldberg | White | Stewart | Clark | Harlan |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Goss (1) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| McNeese (2) | 8-1 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | U |
| Watson (3) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| Wright (4) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| Johnson (5) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| Peterson (6) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | FN |
| Lombard (7) | 9-0 | FB | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | FN |
| Shuttlesworth (8) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | FN |
| Continental (9) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| Favorable Broad | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Favorable Narrow | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 3 |
| Favorable | 8 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 5 |
| Total Favorable | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 9 | 8 |
| Unfavorable | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 |

* In Tables V, VI, VII and VIII the vote of the Court is given with the number of favorable votes first.

TABLE VI.

VOTES IN INTERNAL SECURITY AND IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY CASES: 1962-1963

| Cases | Court | Douglas | Black | Warren | Brennan | Goldberg | White | Stewart | Clark | Harlan |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Internal Security | | | | | | | | | | |
| Yellin (10) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Wheeldin (11) | 3-6 | U | F | F | F | U | U | U | U | U |
| Gastelum (12) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Nationality | | | | | | | | | | |
| Mendoza (20) | 5-4 | FB | FB | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Cort (21) | 7-2 | FB | FB | F | F | F | FN | FN | U | U |
| Rosenberg (22) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |

| | | | | | | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Favorable Broad | | 2 | 2 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Favorable Narrow | | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 |
| Favorable | | 3 | 4 | 6 | 6 | 5 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Total Favorable | | 5 | 6 | 6 | 6 | 5 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 |
| Unfavorable | | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 5 | 5 | 6 | 6 |

TABLE VII.

VOTES IN FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION CASES: 1962-1963

| Cases | Court | Douglas | Black | Warren | Brennan | Goldberg | White | Stewart | Clark | Harlan |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Schempp (13) | 8-1 | FB | F | F | F | F | F | U | F | F |
| Sherbert (14) | 7-2 | F | F | F | F | F | U | F | F | U |
| Bantam (15) | 8-1 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | FN | U |
| Edwards (16) | 8-1 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | U | F |
| Gibson (17) | 5-4 | FB | FB | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Button (18) | 6-3 | F | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U |
| Gray (19) | 8-1 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | U |

| | | | | | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Favorable Broad | 2 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Favorable Narrow | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 |
| Favorable | 5 | 6 | 7 | 7 | 7 | 5 | 4 | 3 | 2 |
| Total Favorable | 7 | 7 | 7 | 7 | 7 | 5 | 4 | 4 | 2 |
| Unfavorable | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 2 | 3 | 3 | 5 |

TABLE VIII.

VOTES IN OTHER CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS: 1962-1963

| Cases | Court | Douglas | Black | Warren | Brennan | Goldberg | White | Stewart | Clark | Harlan |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Ker (23) | 4-5 | F | U | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Wong Sun (24) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Lopez (25) | 3-6 | F | U | U | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Cleary (26) | 3-6 | F | U | F | F | U | U | U | U | U |
| Shotwell (27) | 3-6 | F | F | F | U | U | U | U | U | U |
| Namet (28) | 2-7 | F | F | U | U | U | U | U | U | U |
| Lynumn (29) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| Haynes (30) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Downum (31) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Gideon (32) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| White (33) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| Douglas (34) | 6-3 | F | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U |
| Lane (35) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | FN | FN |
| Draper (36) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Norvell (37) | 2-7 | U | U | U | U | F | U | F | U | U |
| Rideau (38) | 7-2 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | U | U |
| Brady (39) | 2-7 | U | F | U | U | U | U | U | U | F |
| Fay (40) | 6-3 | F | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U |
| Townsend (41) | 5-4 | F | F | F | F | F | U | U | U | U |
| Jones (42) | 9-0 | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F | F |
| Favorable Broad | | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Favorable Narrow | | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 |
| Favorable | | 18 | 16 | 16 | 16 | 16 | 8 | 7 | 4 | 5 |
| Total Favorable | | 18 | 16 | 16 | 16 | 16 | 8 | 7 | 5 | 6 |
| Unfavorable | | 2 | 4 | 4 | 4 | 4 | 12 | 13 | 15 | 14 |

COLUMBIA JOURNALISM REVIEW
Fall, 1962

Supreme Court
1963

INTRODUCTION

Observers of public opinion were quite startled recently by the extreme range of reaction to the Supreme Court decision declaring unconstitutional the composing or sanctioning of prayer by the State for the public schools. Later events demonstrated that a distinction could be made between the earliest reaction and those "second-thought" opinions reflecting more attention to the actual wording of the Supreme Court ruling. The incident served to highlight both the responsibility of religious leaders to think through their positions before making hasty response, and the responsibility of the mass media in communicating as accurately as possible the decision of the court. It is one thing to headline "GOD BANNED FROM THE STATE," another to declare "COURT RULES UNCONSTITUTIONAL STATE COMPOSITION OF PUBLIC SCHOOL PRAYER," granting of course that a short headline is more readable.

The "Columbia Journalism Review" of Fall, 1962, a quarterly under the auspices of the Columbia faculty, alumni and friends of the graduate school of journalism, Columbia University, examined the role of journalism in reporting the school prayer decision and the consequences of its role. The project Religious Freedom and Public Affairs reprints, with the kind permission of the Columbia School of Journalism, this incisive article written by William A. Hachten, Assistant Professor at the University of Wisconsin. Not only did the magazine feature this study, but it chose as well to editorialize on the question. The editorial follows:

On covering the court

Starting on page 6, the Review chronicles journalism's role in recording the Supreme Court's prayer-in-school decision and the wave of indignation that followed. Many of the first comments, the story notes, came from persons who could not have had full knowledge of the decision, much less its still-debated implications. Moreover, there is room for suspicion that some public figures who shot from the hip later felt obliged to cling to their early positions.

That the limited, undefinitive nature of the decision was not clear in many of the early stories is a reflection not only on the contentious wording of the Black and Douglas opinions, but on the ancient system under which Supreme Court decisions are announced and reported. No member of the Court simply announces a 5-4 or 6-3 decision. The opinions on a case, however long and complex, are simply released to the press at the moment when a justice starts to read the first one dealing with a given case. It is up to the reporters, suddenly loaded with an armful of paper, to determine what the decision is and what it means. In the competition among wire services and networks, there is inevitably a race to see which one can first divine the decision and tell the world.

In 1935, this kind of race caused a major error. When the Court released a tangled bundle of opinions on the gold-standard cases, The Associated Press misinterpreted a majority opinion and transmitted a flash and a bulletin stating the opposite of the Court's intent.

The system prevailing today is much the same, except for the addition of pneumatic tubes (replacing messengers) to carry the opinions from reporters inside to reporters waiting outside. In the school-prayer case, the system did not produce any error of fact. Yet the wire service that "lost" the race to complete the first story—United Press International—apparently made good use of the additional time and produced a version that gave a somewhat clearer idea of the opinion. Both stories, however, were put forth to the public in forms so short as to cause even those predisposed to support the decision to misjudge its breadth.

Change, if any, will have to come from those concerned with the decisions and the reporting of them. Recognizing the possible consequences of public misinterpretation of a key decision, the justice writing the majority opinion might well strive to make crystal clear just what the decision is and what its scope is, as well as what the principal reasoning behind it is. There is nothing requiring that Supreme Court opinions be less than lucid.

For their part, the news organizations involved might well subordinate the practice of breakneck competition enough to insure real precision of reporting. In respect to major Supreme Court decisions we could stand a bit more of the old slogan: "Get it first, but first get it right."

Journalism and

In this study, a news story notable for the suddenness of the event and the speed of the reaction is, in effect, scrutinized in slow motion. The article is based on material supplied by the wire services, a network, and the National Conference of Christians and Jews, and on a study of a national cross section of newspapers. The writer, William A. Hachten, is an assistant professor of journalism at the University of Wisconsin with earlier experience on California newspapers.

By WILLIAM A. HACHTEN

On June 25, 1962, the United States Supreme Court handed down sixteen decisions. Of the sixteen, one commanded immediate attention. Wire-service reporters led their stories with it, radio and television and afternoon newspapers used it prominently, and by the following morning it had become the leading story in most newspapers.

It was, of course, the ruling that the recitation of an official twenty-two-word prayer in New York State's public schools violated the First Amendment to the Constitution. The vote was 6 to 1. Justice Hugo L. Black wrote and read the majority opinion. Justice William O. Douglas wrote a concurring opinion. Justice Potter Stewart dissented.

The first publicly spoken responses to the decision were highly critical, even outraged. Members of Congress, religious leaders, and educational officials placed thousands of words of explosive commentary on the record. The Supreme Court received hundreds of critical letters and telegrams.

This kind of nationwide reaction was unusual in the recent history of the Court. But did it rise entirely from the nature of the decision itself? Or was it to an extent a result of the way the original story was reported and edited — particularly by the major wire services and the broadcasting outlets and newspapers dependent on them? Did the news media help to create the reaction and to expand it once it had begun? Finally, did the opinions and interpretations offered by the press clarify the issue?

First, the original handling of the story: Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark, breaking the unwritten rule of "no comment" on decisions, has offered the opinion that considerable public misunderstanding stemmed from pressures on reporters to communicate the ruling rapidly, with half a dozen other major decisions. Speaking in San Francisco at the American Bar Association convention in August, Justice Clark said that the decision provoked the Court's heaviest flow of critical mail in years. But when news media began to interpret the decision later, he said, the mail became more favorable.

Clark said: "Here was a state-written prayer circulated to state-employed teachers with instructions to have their pupils recite it in unison at the beginning of each school day. The Constitution says that the government shall take no part in the establishment of religion. No means no. As soon as people learned that this was all the court decided—not that there could be no official recognition of a Divine Being or recognition on silver or currency of 'In God We Trust', or public acknowledgment that we are a religious nation—they understood the basis on which the court acted.

"The news announcements were not complete, most of them reciting the content of the twenty-two-word prayer and the fact that the court had held it unconstitutional for a teacher to have her pupils recite it."

Wire-service reporters who covered the Court on June 25 have accepted no part of Justice Clark's charge. Editor & Publisher for August 11, 1962,

the prayer decision

quoted Paul Yost, an Associated Press Supreme Court reporter for eighteen years, as saying: "We had it 100 per cent accurate. We stuck right to the opinion and dealt specifically with what the opinion said."

Charlotte Moulton, Supreme Court reporter for United Press International since 1949, said she did not think that there was anything wrong with her stories or with those she saw by other reporters. "People who read them," she said, "read them with an emotional accompaniment and read into the stories certain inaccuracies."

Who is right, Justice Clark or the reporters? An examination of the stories indicates that both sides are right.

The initial AP and UPI stories were ably and objectively written, fully up to professional reporting standards. But their terseness, especially after pruning by news desks and copy desks, probably contributed to misunderstanding. (See excerpts on page 6.)

Nor were matters necessarily helped by the headlines. There is a considerable difference between the specific "N.Y. School Prayer Held Unconstitutional" (The Evening Bulletin, Providence, June 25) and the general "Court Rules Out Prayers in Schools" (Los Angeles Times, June 26). The majority of newspapers appear to have kept "prayer" in the singular, but many failed to specify either its official character or its origin in New York state. A middle-of-the-road headline, no doubt seen by many members of Congress who commented on the decision, was the one in The Evening Star, Washington: "High Court Bans School Prayer," reading out to "1st Amendment Provision Cited In 6-1 Decision," followed by "Area Practices Seen Affected, Stewart Dissents."

The sequence of early comment, in the order it was transmitted by The Associated Press, ran as follows:

Leo Pfeffer, general counsel, American Jewish Congress: "I am highly gratified by the decision." (2:29 p.m., June 25)

Senator Jacob K. Javits of New York: "There is plenty of opportunity afforded to parents . . . to inculcate religious faith in their children at home and at weekend religious schools." (3:23 p.m.)

Representative John J. Rooney of New York said the decision put American public schools on the same footing with Russian schools, "in which mention of a Supreme Being is not permitted." (3:23 p.m.)

Representative George Grant, Alabama: "They can't keep us from praying for the Supreme Court." (3:23 p.m.)

Representative George Andrews, Alabama: "They put the Negroes in the schools and now they've driven God out of them." (3:23 p.m.)

Representative Howard W. Smith, Virginia: "The next thing you know, they'll be telling us we can't open our daily House sessions with prayer." (4:12 p.m.)

Alan Reitman, assistant executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the decision might end all religious observances in public schools. (4:59 p.m.)

William J. Butler, lawyer for the Long Island parents who took the case to the Supreme Court, said roughly the same thing. (4:59 p.m.)

The Reverend Stanley Mooneyham, director of information, National Association of Evangelicals: "The only way left for the majority to express their opinion is to have the majority push for a constitutional amendment." (5:10 p.m.)

Dr. Alcwyn Roberts, National Council of Churches: No comment. (5:10 p.m.)

Francis Cardinal Spellman said he was "shocked and frightened" by the decision. "The decision strikes at the very heart of the Godly tradition in which America's children have so long been raised." (6:11 p.m.)

Billy Graham, evangelist: "This is another step toward the secularization of the United States." (9:23 p.m.)

PRODUCED UNDER PRESSURE: Below are transcripts of the first stories on the prayer decision sent by AP and UPI, and the first paragraphs of subsequent revisions.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

11:54 a.m. — Bulletin

Washington, June 25 (AP) — The Supreme Court ruled today the offering of a 22-word daily prayer in New York State's public schools violates the U. S. Constitution.

12:02 p.m. — First add

Five parents with children in schools in New Hyde Park, N. Y., had questioned the practice as a violation of the principle of separation of church and state.

New York State's Board of Regents, the governing body of the public school system, recommended that this prayer be spoken in school opening exercises:

"Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our country."

Justice Black wrote the court majority opinion which declared:

"We think that by using its public school system to encourage recitation of the regent's prayer, the State of New York has adopted a practice wholly inconsistent with the establishment clause" of the U. S. Constitution.

The First Amendment to the Constitution commands that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

Justice Stewart wrote a dissenting opinion which declared "the Court has misapplied a great constitutional principle."

Stewart added, "I cannot see how an 'official religion' is established by letting those who want to say a prayer say it. On the contrary, I think that to deny the wish of these school children to join in reciting this prayer is to deny them the opportunity of sharing in the spiritual heritage of our nation."

Justice Douglas wrote an opinion concurring with the majority.

Justices White and Frankfurter took no part.

The Court's vote was thus 6-1.

1:39 p.m. — First lead

Washington, June 25 (AP) — The Supreme Court ruled 6-1 today that New York State sponsorship of a 22-word daily prayer for recitation in public schools violates the U. S. Constitution . . .

UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL

11:58 a.m. — Bulletin

Washington, June 25 (UPI) — The Supreme Court ruled today that daily recital of an official state prayer in public schools, even though non-compulsory, offends the religious freedom guarantees in the Constitution.

11:58 a.m. — First add

The 6-1 decision came in a New York case but will affect many thousands of schools throughout the country.

12:10 p.m. — Second add

Justice Hugo L. Black wrote the court's decision. The dissenter was Justice Potter Stewart. Justices Felix Frankfurter and Byron R. White did not participate.

Black said "It has been argued that to apply the Constitution in such a way as to prohibit state laws respecting an establishment of religious services in public schools is to indicate a hostility toward religion or toward prayer."

"Nothing, of course, could be more wrong," he said.

But he added: "It is neither sacrilegious nor anti-religious to say that each separate government in this country should stay out of the business of writing or sanctioning official prayers and leave that purely religious function to the people themselves and to those the people choose to look to for religious guidance.". . .

12:29 p.m. — First lead

By Charlotte G. Moulton

Washington, June 25 (UPI) — The Supreme Court ruled today that the daily recital of an official state prayer in public schools is unconstitutional because it violates the religious freedom guaranteed in the Bill of Rights . . .

1:18 p.m. — Second lead

By Charlotte G. Moulton

Washington, June 25 (UPI) — The Supreme Court ruled today that it is unconstitutional to have public school children recite official state prayers as a daily exercise . . .

In the next hours and days, many others had their opinions in print. To mention only those at the peak of eminence:

Two former Presidents—Hoover and Eisenhower—reacted unfavorably, the former proposing a constitutional amendment. A comment by former President Truman to the effect that it was the Court's business to interpret the Constitution received little attention. On Wednesday, June 27, President Kennedy asked in his news conference for support of the decision and suggested prayer at home.

The sweep of the reaction can be gauged in the actions of two bodies of elected politicians. The Governor's Conference endorsed the idea of a constitutional amendment, 49 to 0. (Governor Rockefeller of New York abstained because he said the decision merited further study.) In Congress, no fewer than forty-two such proposals were put forward in the House alone.

Before the week end, quieting influences began to take hold. For one thing, the words of the opinion itself probably received further study. Many large newspapers ran editorials either supporting the decision or pointing out its limited scope. At the beginning of the following week, the major news magazines ran stories that discussed the decision calmly. U. S. News & World Report ran excerpts from the Black and Stewart opinions. Newsweek gave four pages to the opinion and the furor. Time's coverage was also complete.

As the volume of informed comment grew, the reaction continued to subside.

In fact, there was a discernible turning point in the flow of comment in the week of July 8 to 15. The Religious News Service (operated by the National Conference of Christians and Jews) described this "second wave" as "more temperate, with more distinction being made between the actual decision . . . and what was repeatedly referred to as the possible implications of that decision."

The dwindling of reaction indicated that the American public had decided to accept the decision, despite the fact that nearly 80 per cent of a sample questioned by the Gallup Poll favored prayers in public schools.

On any question as controversial as this one, violent reaction from some quarters was probably inevitable, regardless of the way it was covered. The volume of mail received by the Court in April, when the case was argued, points to an organized pro-prayer effort, although no such effort was reported in the press. But there can be doubt that confusion and misunderstanding should have been as widespread as they were. There seems little question but that the mechanics of handling news contributed to the reaction. It can be argued that the following sequence took place:

First, the opinion itself, while no more complex than many other matters that have come before the Court, was bound to seize wider attention than most such statements. Some journalists have argued that the opinion was not well stated for broad public consumption. In his column of August 13 in the New York Herald Tribune, David Lawrence wrote: "...the fault is not with the press or the public, but with the complex and often ambiguous language in which the opinions of the Justices themselves are presented."

This view received support in the September issue of Commentary, a monthly sponsored by the American Jewish Committee. In "School Prayers and the Founding Fathers," Leonard W. Levy of Brandeis University, author of Legacy of Suppression (1960), a study of the First Amendment, approved the decision but wrote:

> The Court has reaped the scorn of a confused and aroused public because it has been inconsistent; moreover, its past compromises failed to prepare the public for a principled decision.

And:

> The public, which has little patience with legal distinctions, has a right to be appalled at the contradictory results of the Court's various decisions on the establishment clause: New York's released-time program of religious education for public school children, New Jersey's subsidized bus rides for parochial school children, and Massachusetts' Sunday closing or blue laws are not, the Court has ruled, violations of the establishment clause....That Justice Black, the author of the school-bus decision (constitutional) is also the author of the school-prayer decision (unconstitutional) only adds to the public's confusion.

Even granting that the Court was not as direct as it could have been, journalism must still be held accountable, for it has the task of reporting any important event or statement, no matter how badly organized it may be.

The initial wire-service stories, while fast, accurate, and objective, were too brief to counter squarely the two most widespread misconceptions about the decision: first, that it had in one stroke banned all religious observance from public life or education; second, that it was a decision that had taken a position against religion in general.

In the reporters' favor, it should be noted that many placed high in their stories the paragraph from the Black opinion selected by authorities on constitutional law as the crux of the decision:

> It is neither sacrilegious nor anti-religious to say that each separate government in this country should stay out of the business of writing or sanctioning official prayers and leave that purely religious function to the people themselves and to those the people choose to look to for religious guidance.

Or its rough equivalent, elsewhere in the opinion:

> . . . it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as part of a religious program carried on by government.

Later in the day, the wire services, in their efforts to follow up an obviously "hot" story, worked on a first-come, first-served basis in selecting persons for comment. There was balance in the choice of clergymen, but not in congressional comment, which was heavily loaded with Southerners already hostile to the court for its desegregation decisions and Easterners whose religious feelings were outraged.

It was pointed out in The New York Times on June 26 that, according to a 1961 sampling of schools, the East and the South were the only areas in the country that had widespread public-school prayers. Less than 10 per cent of schools elsewhere participated. This fact suggests that the wire services obtained comment largely from the angriest members of Congress.

In commenting on Justice Clark's charges, Julius Frandsen, Washington bureau manager for UPI, said: "He is evidently confusing what news agencies have written with what certain members of Congress and the clergy were saying."

However, the wire services must bear responsibility on this point. The news-gathering processes gave them ample opportunity to balance their stories and to include informed comments. The press need not be a mere transmission belt for the reckless.

Clarification and interpretation did come eventually. A number of newspapers—among them, The New York Times, The Washington Post, the Chicago Daily News, The Milwaukee Journal, and The St. Louis Post-Dispatch—ran a good share of the Black opinion and the Stewart dissent. Discerning, calm editorials also helped. Unfortunately, such clarification appeared belatedly in many papers.

Finally, American journalism had another responsibility that was not effectively discharged in every instance. A free and independent press has a constitutional obligation to protect civil liberties against the encroachments of government. This obligation also means that the press should explain

Burris Jenkins, Jr., in N. Y. Journal-American

Quo Vadis?

Bruce Russell in Los Angeles Times to the public the meaning of governmental acts pertaining to those liberties.

In this case, journalism was slow to explain fully and some news organizations in fact seemed to be as much in the grip of anger and intemperance as the public. It is a paradox that a few angry newspapers recommended that the First Amendment be rewritten, as was the case in a signed editorial by William Randolph Hearst, Jr., that appeared in Hearst newspapers.

It can justifiably be asked what contribution is made to understanding (not necessarily support) of the decision by such editorial comments as the following:

> If this device [a prayer drawn up by three religious leaders] is eventually prohibited by an atheistic, agnostic or what-have-you Supreme Court majority, other dodges and end-runs can be figured out by active minds in religious circles. Sooner or later, such tactics should make a complete monkey and dead-letter out of Monday's Warren Court ruling. (New York Daily News, June 29.)

> . . . six justices of the Supreme Court of the United States have been persuaded by a small group of guardhouse sophists to make a burlesque show of the world's first complete declaration of religious toleration. (Los Angeles Times, June 28.)

> It is difficult to understand how any six men in the United States could agree on this decision, written by Justice Hugo Black, who started his political career in the Ku Klux Klan but who, on the bench, became the leader of the radical left. Here is a decision without a quoted precedent, with no roots in law, with no historic basis. (New York Mirror, June 28.)

The fact that all of those cited above happen to be known as conservative newspapers is beside the point. Other newspapers, equally conservative, followed the almost self-evident dictum expressed by Ned Calmer on "WCBS-TV Views the Press" on July 1:

> Editorially . . . a newspaper has the primary right to assume any stand it chooses. A fitting corollary might be that a newspaper has a duty to express itself — especially on such a basic issue — with reflection and restraint.

"Reflection and restraint" may be better advice for editorial writers than for reporters. It is hard to counsel men whose primary duty is to report events as they happen to exercise deliberation. Yet there should be a point in the development of a story where speed gives way to reflection. For much of American journalism, this point came too late in the school-prayer case. And for one segment, it never came at all.

The 11th Commandment

Jacob Burck in Chicago Sun-Times

"LEAVING RELIGION TO PRIVATE INITIATIVE IS UN-AMERCAN!"

Herblock in The Washington Post

WHAT IS THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS?

NCCJ is a civic organization engaged in a nation-wide program of intergroup education. It enlists Protestants, Catholics and Jews who without compromise of conscience or of their distinctive and important religious differences work together to build better relationships among men of all religions, races and nationalities. Its operation is civic and social although, obviously, the roots of the brotherhood which it seeks to build are in the moral law and in religious faith.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS

43 West 57th St. • New York 19, N. Y.

The NCCJ project Religious Freedom and Public Affairs is designed to raise the general level of public understanding and discussion on issues of public concern about which religious groups differ. The main objectives of this project are: to analyze the practical and theoretical problems involving political action and religious freedom; to effectuate a greater understanding of the significance of those religious commitments that affect public policy; and to lessen needless conflict created by different religious approaches to social problems.

Union College-Symposium
Spring 1963
Supreme Court

'GOD SAVE THIS HONORABLE COURT'

by Sven R. Peterson

On June 25, 1962, the United States Supreme Court handed down sixteen decisions, one of which provoked almost immediately a wave of highly critical, even outraged comments expressed in editorials, sermons, speeches, letters and telegrams. This was, of course, the 6-to-1 ruling that the so-called Regent's prayer used in many New York State schools was in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution. Justice Hugo L. Black wrote the majority opinion, Justice William O. Douglas wrote a concurring opinion, and Justice Potter Stewart dissented.

A decision such as this one has many ramifications. It circulates down through the hierarchical structure of our legal system, influencing opinions here and guiding decisions there, and at the bottom, in the local courts, sets off a fresh wave of cases which are appealed upward through various courts and eventually appear before the Supreme Court. Many of these cases the Supreme Court refuses to review; the ones it accepts are presumably those whose nature makes them typical cases, or those which illustrate or clarify some legal point. Two such cases—one from Maryland, the other from Pennsylvania—are before the Supreme Court at present; hence the exact nature of these cases is of considerable interest. Both deal with Bible reading, but in different ways.

In the Maryland case, the Baltimore city school board has a rule providing for daily Bible reading and reciting of a prayer. Although there is no compulsion on students to attend the morning exercise, Mrs. Madalyn E. Murray and her son William, alleging that the boy was spat on, assaulted, and subjected to student and teacher sanctions because he walked out on the exercises, have requested protection from such injury. The Baltimore city attorneys have argued that there is no constitutional violation if there is no compulsion, and that anyone who dissents runs the risk of disapproval. They have also argued, somewhat begging the question, that further litigation would result in removal of "every vestige of our religious heritage" from public life; and, in a curious reversal, the lawyers have claimed on the other hand that the exercises are no longer of a religious nature anyway, though they may once have been, but rather are simply considered to be "a good practice for the benefit of the children and to put them into a good frame of mind."

In the Pennsylvania case, involving the Abington School District, ten Bible verses are read each school day over a loudspeaker, and the children are encouraged to read their own Bibles. It was argued in this case that no child had ever asked to be excused, hence there was no evidence of any compulsion being used. It was argued further that a decision against such Bible reading would be an expression of hostility to religion, thereby violating the requirement of the First Amendment that the government remain neutral. At the same time, it was argued that the Bible reading was not a religious practice but an educational one, that the practice extended back to colonial days, and that the purpose was to teach lessons of morality—in fact, that the Bible reading was one of the last vestiges of moral value left in the school system.

Herblock © Cartoon

"Leaving Religion to Private Initiative Is Un-American!"

These arguments, culled from newspaper accounts, are a representative sample, not of the level of argument before the Supreme Court, perhaps, but of what newspaper reporters find to be newsworthy. Taken in the abstract, the level of argumentation does not seem to be very high, but this does not really matter, for the important thing is the effectiveness of the arguments in shaping the tone or substance of the final verdicts. The Court is known to be somewhat responsive to public opinion; as a matter of fact, after the original decision Justice Tom C. Clark, speaking before a convention of lawyers in San Francisco, broke the rule of "no comment" on decisions to talk about the critical mail the Court had received after its June decision. He implied that hasty reporting, inaccurate summaries, and scare headlines were to blame for the initial uproar, and that later on, when the news media had had an opportunity to explain more fully, the mail became more favorable. The press has denied this charge, of course, and some columnists have retaliated by charging that the language of the decision itself was too complex and ambiguous to be understood. The noteworthy thing here is the implication that the Court reads its mail and is perfectly aware of its role, as final authority on the meaning of the Constitution, in shaping at least some aspects of public life, and hence of rousing many layers of deep-seated habit, custom, and conviction. The justices do not inhabit any sort of ivory tower; they are immersed in public life as much as anyone else; the big difference is that they are responsible for certain aspects of that public life in a way that no one else is.

EVERYTHING depends on what is in the minds of the justices as they ponder these new cases; the barrage of opinions—temperate or intemperate, hasty or considered—in point of fact plays very little part in shaping the law of the land. This fact seems so self-evident that it is surprising so few writers on the subject have examined the one document that is a key to the thinking of the justices—the text of the original decision of June 25, 1962. A careful examination of this decision, together with its learned footnotes and supplementary material, is the only way to delineate accurately the issues in question, the scope of the decision, and the nature of the arguments that seemed decisive to the justices themselves. There is nothing particularly difficult or complex about this text, nor does it rest on complicated legal issues. Some of the arguments in it are as bad as the arguments of the lawyers, but that is quite irrelevant: the justices are not pleading before any higher court, where good arguments count for more than bad arguments; rather they are stating the reasons for deciding as they did. Using these reasons as a touchstone, we can begin to predict, with some faint hope of accuracy, how future decisions in this tangled area might proceed.

The decision in the Regents' prayer case is found in the U. S. Supreme Court Reports for July 16, 1962 and runs from page 601 to page 619. Very briefly, Justice Black held that using the New York public school system to encourage recitation of the prayer was wholly inconsistent with the clause of the First Amendment which prohibits laws respecting an establishment of religion. Justice Douglas concurred on the ground that the state was financing this religious exercise, and remarked that in retrospect the Everson case, involving public school buses to parochial schools, seemed also to be out of line with the First Amendment. Justice Stewart dissented on the ground that no "official religion" was involved. Let us now consider these three statements in turn.

First, the facts. The Board of Education of Union Free School District No. 9, New Hyde Park, directed the school principal to have the Regents' prayer recited aloud by each class at the beginning of each school day. The Regents' prayer is as follows:

> Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our country.

The parents of ten pupils brought action in a state court, claiming (1) the state law authorizing the use of prayer in public schools, and (2) the School District regulations authorizing the use of this particular prayer, were both in violation of the "establishment" clause of the First Amendment.

In his majority opinion, Justice Black made the following points:

¶ The daily recital of the Regents' prayer is undoubtedly a religious exercise. This was denied by no one.

¶ The use of the prayer by the school system "breaches the constitutional wall of separation between Church and State." Whatever else the establishment clause means, it means that "it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by the government."

¶ It is a matter of history that many of our early colonists came to America to avoid governmentally composed prayers for religious services; it is an unfortunate fact of history that some of these same dissident groups, once they gained control of state legislatures, made their own religions the official religion of their state.

¶ Our Founding Fathers, knowing "the anguish, hardship and bitter strife that could come when zealous religious groups struggled with one another to obtain the Government's stamp of approval from each King, Queen, or Protector that came to temporary power," intended the First Amendment to stand as

---

SVEN R. PETERSON, chairman and associate professor of philosophy, has been at Union since 1952. As a logician he is fascinated not only by the logic of the law, but also by the anti-logic of Lewis Carroll, on whose work he is expert.

a guarantee that "neither the power nor the prestige of the Federal Government would be used to control, support, or influence the kinds of prayer the American people can say"—that is, that religion would remain independent of the vicissitudes of political power.

¶ The New York prayer program "officially establishes the religious beliefs embodied in the Regents' prayer." The facts that the prayer is non-denominational, and that observance is voluntary, might serve to exempt this prayer recital from the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, but not from the Establishment Clause. In brief, a religious exercise has been established, even though pupils are allegedly free to choose whether or not to participate.

¶ In fact, establishment of a religion is already indirect coercive pressure, and historically it often leads to direct pressure to conform. The Establishment Clause rests on the belief "that a union of government and religion tends to destroy government and to degrade religion." If government allies itself with any one religion, the "inevitable" result has been that it has incurred the hatred, disrespect, and even contempt of those who hold contrary religious beliefs. The same history shows conversely that any religion that relies on the support of government loses much respect.

¶ This decision does not indicate a hostility toward either religion or prayer. The First Amendment was not written to destroy either religion or prayer, but "to put an end to governmental control" which in the past had shackled men's tongues: ". . . each separate government in this country should stay out of the business of writing or sanctioning official prayers and leave that purely religious function to the people themselves. . ."

¶ The fact that the Regents' prayer is so brief and general does not make it harmless. James Madison, who wrote the First Amendment, said:

> It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. . . . Who does not see that the same authority which can establish Christianity, in exclusion of all other Religions, may establish with the same ease any particular sect of Christians, in exclusion of all other sects?

What conclusions can we draw from these eight points? First of all, though much of the wording is directed against the fact that the Regents actually composed the prayer in question, it is clear that the deeper point is the establishment of a prayer, and not its nature or composition. Hence it seems likely that, if the court remains consistent, the establishment of the Lord's prayer will be ruled out in the same way and for the same reasons. What about reading from the Bible? It seems clear that such reading will be construed as an exercise in religion, not as an exercise in morality or in our American heritage, and certainly not as an act of scholarship or comparative religion. If Bible-reading is a religious act, then its establishment will be ruled out.

What constitutes an establishment of religion? Justice Douglas, in his concurring opinion, singles out the factor of financing the religious exercise, that is, using school time and the paid services of a teacher. He goes further. He points out that what New York did on the opening of its public schools was precisely what both Congress and the Supreme Court itself do at the beginning of each session, namely use a paid chaplain or marshal to intone a prayer. A footnote lists many more such anomalies. The very same First Congress that wrote the First Amendment also provided for chaplains in Congress and in the armed services. There is compulsory chapel at the service academies. Religious services are held in federal prisons and hospitals, to what might be called captive audiences. The President issues religious proclamations. The Bible is used for the administration of oaths. NYA and WPA funds were available to parochial schools during the Depression. There is Bible-reading in the schools of the District of Columbia, and religious instruction in the District's National Training School for Boys. Is it possible to draw a clear line through such cases and to separate those which are legitimate from those which are establishments? Justice Douglas does not bother, saying merely: "Our system at the federal and state levels is presently honeycombed with such financing. Nevertheless, I think it is an unconstitutional undertaking whatever form it takes." It would seem that Justice Douglas, at least, is prepared to strike even the motto "In God We Trust" from all our coins and currency. Though this motto was first authorized for coins in 1865, it did not become mandatory on all coins and currency until 1955, so that in fact it is of rather recent vintage.

WILL THE Court attempt to pick a line through these tangled anomalies? Can a distinction be drawn on the ground that prayers in the school and under the auspices of a teacher amount to religious instruction or guidance in some way that a conventional invocation, oath-taking, proclamation, or motto is not? Is a prayer or Bible-reading under such auspices of a credal nature, an avowal of presumably important and deeply-held convictions, and hence something that should not be imposed on impressionable young minds by lay persons? The Court clearly means to encourage children to go to their religious teachers for such guidance. But what then of the compulsory chapels in the service academies? The stand of Justice Douglas is clear: if the person praying is a public official on the public payroll, performing a religious exercise in a governmental institution, he must go. Once government finances a religious exercise it inserts a divisive influence into our communities; Justice Douglas points out, for example, that the apparently innocuous Regents' prayer does not conform to all of the tenets of the Jewish, Unitarian, and Ethical Culture groups, and that one of the petitioners in the case is an agnostic.

One simple procedure, one which the Court tends to follow in any case, is never to ask for trouble—to construe each decision as narrowly as possible, and to do nothing if there are no complaints. Thus the mottoes and invocations are likely to remain undisturbed, but new cases, for example, concerning the phrase "under God" inserted in our Pledge of Allegiance in 1954, are likely to arise. It also seems probable that the Everson decision, to allow public money to pay the bus fares of parochial pupils, will be re-opened in some form, and if so, that Justice Douglas for one will vote it unconstitutional, on the ground that by the same token other needs can also be met—lunches, books, tuition, etc. And he will surely quote Madison again:

> Public money devoted to payment of religious costs, educational or other, brings the quest for more. It brings too the struggle of sect against sect for the larger share or for any. Here one by numbers alone will benefit most, there another. That is precisely the history of societies which have had an established religion and dissident groups.

It is clear how Justice Douglas will decide in all these questions, if and when they come before the Court, but what about the other justices? The only clue we have is in footnote 21 of Justice Black's opinion, which deserves to be quoted in full:

> There is of course nothing in the decision reached here that is inconsistent with the fact that school children and others are officially encouraged to express love for our country by reciting historical documents such as the Declaration of Independence which contain references to the Deity or by singing officially espoused anthems which include the composer's professions of faith in a Supreme Being, or with the fact that there are many manifestations in our public life of belief in God. Such patriotic or ceremonial occasions bear no true resemblance to the unquestioned religious exercise that the State of New York has sponsored in this instance.

ASSUMING that this footnote is agreeable to a majority of the justices, it follows that an attempt will be made to draw the line in some fashion between "unquestioned religious exercises" and "patriotic or ceremonial occasions." The compulsory chapels at the service academies may very well go, as did segregation in the armed forces, but the ceremonially pious utterances will remain.

Let us now turn to the dissenting arguments of Justice Stewart. The first of these is the ingenious one often used by the lawyers in the cases, that the Court is preventing the free exercise of religion:

> I cannot see how an "official religion" is established by letting those who want to say a prayer say it. On the contrary, I think that to deny the wish of these school children to join in reciting this prayer is to deny them the opportunity of sharing in the spiritual heritage of our Nation.

This reference to "the spiritual heritage of our Nation" is curiously coupled with a rejection of the lengthy historical arguments of Justice Black concerning the established church in England and in the early colonies:

> What is relevant to the issue here is not the history of an established church in 16th century England or in 18th century America, but the history of the religious traditions of our people, reflected in countless practices of the institutions and officials of our government.

Justice Stewart then reviews the anomalies we have mentioned before, and adds quotations from several presidential addresses to establish that all our presidents, without exception, have called upon God for protection and help. There is no question of the facts here, of course, only of the relevance; but Justice Stewart does not seem to contribute anything new, except when in his footnote 9, commenting on footnote 21 of the majority opinion, he strikes a telling blow: " . . . is the Court suggesting that the Constitution permits judges and Congressmen and Presidents to join in prayer, but prohibits school children from doing so?" There is nothing more to Justice Stewart's dissent than this rather emotional appeal to "the deeply entrenched and highly cherished traditions of our Nation." The trouble is that the tradition being referred to is a public and ceremonial one, which, as we have seen, is relatively safe, and the only tradition of religious exercises for school children, which is after all the point at issue, lies in the history of the established Church of England and of the colonies, the same history which is rejected by Justice Stewart as somehow irrelevant to our glorious tradition.

WHAT OF the issue of compulsion? Is it true that our politicians are free to pray publicly to God while our school children are forced to remain silent? Yes and no. The children are encouraged by the Court to express their religious convictions in the home and in the church, without favor or discrimination from the state. On the other hand, the glorious national heritage, which is clearly Protestant in character, and historically has usually discriminated against such minorities as Catholics, Jews, free-thinkers, agnostics, and outright atheists, is being prevented from dominating these minority opinions with public funds and on public time. The fact that the religious observances being questioned are clearly voluntary, and not compulsory on each student, is irrelevant to the main fact that the public funds and resources are being used to further religious observances that are not quite neutral in character. The fact that parents are concerned enough to protest should be sufficient; the argument that the national heritage is threatened is simply the argument that the more-or-less Protestant majority should be allowed to prevail against the various minorities on religious questions. And perhaps the majority should prevail; perhaps the ideal of true religious neutrality is a chimerical one that is hopeless of attainment. The question can be debated endlessly and fruitlessly; but the clear fact is that the Court is following the clearly stated intention of the Founding Fathers to avoid any degree of established religion, that it has construed an apparently innocuous prayer delivered at public expense to be one step toward such establishment, and that it is likely to make all future decisions in the same spirit. The writer of the First Amendment did not want our national heritage to reflect any established support of the Protestant or any other religious sect, hence presumably not any financial support either. It seems safe to predict that still more fundamental decisions than the Regents' prayer case will be decided in the next few weeks and years, and that they will all be decided against anything that smacks of the establishment of any religion.

RIGHT MAY SHUN TENNESSEE VOTE

Both Senatorial Candidates Seeking Liberal Support

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

MEMPHIS, Oct. 29—Like the liberals of Georgia and Alabama, the right-wingers of Tennessee have no one to vote for in their top political race this fall.

All four persons running for Governor in Georgia and Alabama are conservative segregationists, leaving many liberals and Negroes so disgruntled that they may boycott the elections there Nov. 8.

In Tennessee, the two men running for the Senate—Gov. Frank G. Clement Jr., the Democrat, and Howard H. Baker Jr., the Republican—are fighting so determinedly for the liberal and middle-of-the-road votes that the right-wingers are left without a candidate. Some are talking of a boycott.

Tom Anderson of Nashville, editor of The Tennessee Farmer and a member of the board of the John Birch Society, advised his readers in the October issue of the magazine not to vote in the Senate race. However, he hedged his advice with a reluctant endorsement.

"If I were forced at gunpoint to vote in the Tennessee senatorial election, I would vote for that all-Tennessee Pharisee, Bible-carrying, whisky-drinking hypocrite, Frank Clement Jr.," he wrote.

"I'm for making the Republican party conservative or making it die."

Edged into Isolation

Conservatives of Mr. Anderson's unyielding conviction have been increasingly edged into isolation since 1964, when President Johnson defeated Barry Goldwater in Tennessee by a wide margin.

The Republicans chose as their nominee for the Senate this year a moderate of the kind who once controlled Tennessee Republicanism undisputed. Mr. Baker is the son-in-law of Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois and the son of a man who was a Congressman for 14 years from eastern Tennessee, where Republicans have dominated since the days of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Baker's defeated opponent in the Republican primary was Kenneth Roberts of Nashville, a Goldwater Republican, one of the thousands of middle and western Tennessee Democrats who have joined the G.O.P. in the last decade.

Neither Mr. Baker nor his Democratic opponent is exceptionally liberal. But they are somewhat to the left of most other candidates for major office in the South this year, and they are too liberal to give much comfort to the white backlash voters.

Both might be called "New Deal" liberals. Both favor equal right for Negroes, liberalized Social Security benefits, the Tennessee Valley Authority and increased spending for education.

Mr. Clement seems to be a slight favorite. He is expected to get most of the Negro and laborer voters, who are still leery of the Republicans because of its nomination of Mr. Goldwater. Mr. Baker has been working hard for their support and may receive some.

Most Negro and labor leaders are committed to Governor Clement but they admit they have a problem. Senator Ross Bass, who was defeated by Governor Clement in the Democratic primary, got most of the Negro and labor votes in the primary and that race was so vigorously fought that many who voted for Senator Bass are finding it distasteful to go for Governor Clement. As a result, the leaders are encountering some voter apathy, they say.

Mr. Baker has a comparable problem. Although he has denounced the Birch Society, he is on the ticket with several Goldwater Republicans.

One of these is Representative William Brock of Chattanooga, one of three Republican Congressmen from Tennessee. He is favored to defeat an energetic young Democratic challenger, Franklin Haney.

Two Goldwater Republican Congressional candidates in western Tennessee are given some chance of winning, partly because of white backlash. They are Julius V. Hurst, school superintendent of McNairy County, and Dan Kuykendall, a Memphis life insurance agent.

Mr. Kuykendall is waging an aggressive race against Representative George Grider, a liberal Democrat who has supported the Johnson Administration consistently. Since Mr. Grider was first elected two years ago, a Congressional redistricting has placed thousands of his loyal Negro supporters in two adjacent districts. However, he is still a slight favorite.

Mr. Hurst, widely known for squabbling with the Department of Health, Education and Welfare over school desegregation guidelines, is running against a young state legislator, Ray Blanton. Mr. Blanton defeated Representative Tom Murray, a longtime Congressman, in the Democratic primary. Some observers predict a Hurst victory.

Westchester Unit Approves Offer of Courthouse Site

Special to The New York Times

WHITE PLAINS, Oct. 29—A committee of the Westchester County Board of Supervisors voted unanimously yesterday to accept a city offer of six acres of land in two plots for a new county courthouse.

The offer must now be submitted for approval to the entire board, which has been insisting on one plot of five acres. Approval of the voters in a referendum is also required.

The decision by the County Courthouse Development Committee would place the new courthouse on either a two-acre plot on the east side of Grove Street on Martine Avenue, or on a four-acre site across Grove Street, both of which the county would buy for up to $3-million.

This would leave the city room for a new library adjacent to the four-acre site.

First Snow in Moscow

MOSCOW, Oct. 29 (AP) — The first snow of the winter, 1.18 inches, hit Moscow today.

Massive Problems Await Long-Session Legislature

1/8/67

By JOE HATCHER
Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

TENNESSEE

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Jan. 7. Tennessee's 85th legislature started rolling this past week toward a struggle with, of not solution of, some of the greatest problems facing any of the 84 predecessor sessions.

Some of the major problems before the legislature include: reform of the entire tax structure and assessments; liquor-by-the-drink; capital punishment; redistricting; up to $150 million in new revenues; biennial or annual legislative sessions; legislative expense accounts, and certainly the independence of the legislature from executive dictation.

The legislature followed the usual pattern on organization, accepting the dictates of the governor-elect in the selection of speakers of both houses, along with two constitutional officers and the minor legislative elected officials.

THIS SURRENDER of independence at the start forebodes little change in the domination of the legislature by the governor, but some major changes in party affiliations and personnel could lead to at least a measure of independence in the action of the legislators along the way.

The Republicans now have 41 of the 99 house members, but only 8 of the 33 senators. There are five Negro members whose influence may be greater than their mere numbers where a balance of power might be needed.

The congressional redistricting, which the federal courts say must be done before June 1, 1966, is certain to involve the party alignments. The Republicans now have four of the nine, and were narrowly kept out of the fifth seat and a majority of the state delegation. Certainly the Democratic majority will move to strengthen their congressional representation in Washington.

REAPPORTIONMENT has been okayed by the federal courts, giving the urban centers almost equal strength with the rual - dominated seats in both houses. The Republicans and perhaps the Negro bloc might well swing the balance of power between the urban and rural forces in any fights that might develop. The urban areas, the Republicans, and the Negroes may well await the 1970 census for still further gains.

Under newly approved constitutional amendments, the legislature will work under a new procedural schedule, with the 15-day opening session for organization and preparation for the regular sessions starting the last week in February.

UNDER THE new 90-day session limit instead of the old 75-day plan, there's a big question of whether to hold annual 45-day sessions or the extended bi-ennial session. Odds seem to favor a trial of the annual session proposals this time as a test pattern.

The new governor is not inaugurated until January 15, thus making the first organizational session a lame-duck effort at best.

Gov.-elect Buford Ellington has indicated some of this proposed legislation may be ready for introduction early in the session but the bulk will certainly await his inauguration and the return of the legislators in late February.

1-25-67

City Hall

Debate Seems Big Flaw In Local Poverty Fight

By DICK BATTLE

After a great deal of listening I've discovered what may be the major flaw in the operation of our local War on Poverty:

Battle

The "war" has bogged down to a windy, many-sided debate. Almost everybody has grabbed a piece of the argument — except the poor themselves.

As an "Ad Hoc" committee of one my single purpose is to promote any reasonable plan for fullest practical participation of the poor in programs designed to help families and individuals now in poverty attain the dignity and responsibility of contributing and self-supporting citizenship. I report these personal findings — with humility, sincerity, and deep sense of appreciation for the conscientious — and frustrated — MAC members:

● The 33,000 family survey and census of poverty "target" areas set for Jan. 26 is vital for future success of MAC projects. The survey and the data it must develop is over due. It should have been undertaken and completed two years ago. This wasn't done. The current "crash" program is the result of that neglect.

Regardless of that fact, this information is needed — and needed now — as a basis for every anti-poverty effort that can be funded under the Economic Opportunity Act.

● The so-called "move . . . to create a private, non-profit organization" to administer the poverty program" was misrepresented and distorted

(Turn to Page 16, Column 4)

Red O'Da

City Hall

(Continued From Page One)

by reports of its formation by "a group of Nashville civil rights leaders."

The facts, as obtained from two of the leaders of this "group," indicate there is concern that MAC programs may be cut off if OEO's Atlanta office holds MAC to strict accounting on the census problem. There are also misgivings among this "group" about the so-called "power structure" and about some areas of MAC non-compliance with OEO guidelines. There was no purpose to form a competing or usurping agency duplicating MAC. There is consideration of a new agency which could make contracts for specific projects "if necessary."

● There have been many apparent differences among members of the MAC commission. Listening to most of them I have found there is very little difference about objectives. I have found no disagreement in (1) sincere concern for those in poverty, or (2) the principle the poor should be participants in the plans and programs — at all levels.

● In frank discussions with those who have been critical of MAC I have found wide areas of agreement, and I have found more areas with which they could agree with MAC plans and policies than areas of disagreement.

● I have discovered also there can be direct, friendly and cooperative dialogue, communication and exchange of ideas between the so-called "power structure" — Mayor Briley, himself, for instance— and those who have had honest doubts about the non-political objectivity of our local poverty program from the "power structure" level. I made this discovery through the simple device of bringing about a face-to-face conversation between Briley and another friend of mine, Baxton Bryant. Bryant is the articulate and aggressive executive director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, and a man with whom I maintain a friendly and, highly rewarding feud.

To close this partial report —for there is more to be said —I can clear up a question that bothered my friend, the Rev. Bill Barnes, at an "ad hoc" MAC Bylaw study Monday night: Mayor Briley does not appoint the chairman of any other Metro boards or commissions. The Metro charter specifically provides (Article 11, Ch. 1, Section 11.-

MAC Officer Election Move Anticipated

The Metropolitan Action Commission in regular session Thursday night will learn from its chairman, the Rev. Paschall Davis, that both he and Mayor Briley recommend MAC elect its own chairman and executive committee — if this is the desire of the commission, The Banner learned today.

MAC members also will be assured Mayor Briley is in complete agreement with the election of one-third of MAC members from "target areas" by the "residents of the area who are poor." The mayor's only suggestion is that MAC make certain the poor "and not the politicians" elect the target area representatives.

The MAC meeting will be at Head School, 500 20th Ave. N., at 7:30 p.m. It's probable the suggestions listed here will be urged by the MAC chairman for inclusion in the new by-laws, it was learned.

BANNER 1-27-67

City Hall

1-27-67

New Spirit, Purpose 'Adopted' By MAC

By DICK BATTLE

From debate and discord, from strong discontent and rooted, differing opinions, a new Metropolitan Action Commission is taking shape with objectives higher than a war on poverty.

Battle

As an outsider, I can better testify to the emerging MAC and its greater dedication to a broader cause than can its members. I think I'm right and I believe Thursday night's meeting supports my belief.

New bylaws were adopted, but more important was MAC's adoption of a new spirit and a stronger purpose. This latter action came without spoken word or recorded vote but—I believe—without dissent.

The new bylaws are specific and strictly within the federal OEO requirements. They do NOT—as has been mistakenly reported "strip" Mayor Beverly Briley of any power or authority he cherished or demanded. Briley freely and willingly relinquished any "right" to control, dominate or even select MAC members.

This is one of the things to set a new trend and give MAC new vigor. Some MAC critics and Briley's more bitter detractors don't like this trend because it disarms them.

Those who are more concerned with the problems of the poor than with poverty power [illegible] welcome the change and a new cooperation of so-called "power structure" and some of the elements that have expressed honest distrust in the "power structure" motivation.

Even in disagreement over Bylaw construction, there was a new tolerance — I believe— and a renewed respect for the integrity of differing opinion.

It seems to me MAC may be

(Turn to Page 3, Column 4)

City Hall

(From Page One)

achieving a maturity and objectivity that heretofore was indicated only by worthy and wellworn words written into the OEC guidelines.

I believe that from the chaos of committee sessions and the weekly surge from crisis to crisis MAC is developing a deep and real concern for the PEOPLE who are poor.

This is tremendously different than being merely the directors and strategists waging a "war on poverty."

From now on, however, the personnel of the commission may change — and I would hope there may not be too many changes too quickly other than the election of the one-third membership by the poor and from the poor—this new objective must be top priority.

I'd like to see the phrase "war on poverty" abandoned —at least for our local effort. Let MAC set its purposes higher; Not a "war" against the faceless horror of poverty, but a fight FOR those PEOPLE who are poor.

This is what I see — what I think I see — beginning to develop as MAC struggles to a new stature. This is what we will need when the largesse of the Great Society dwindles to 80 per cent and then down to 50 per cent and finally puts the total burden (where it probably should have been in the beginning) on the hearts, the conscience —and the pocketbooks—of our own community.

There is a continuing need for MAC to honestly evaluate its staff from the executive director down. There is a necessity for standards of efficiency, for strict qualifications for competence for jobs —from the director on down. This has not been the case in the past.

The census undertaken by MAC with volunteer help brought out 500 men and women Thursday. It was a most encouraging indication of real citizen concern for the cause of "people who are poor."

There is no assurance the Atlanta OEO will fund and approve MAC programs unless every detail of compliance is accomplished by March 1— and this may be impossible.

I am personally disheartened at the news Dick Hume has resigned. The Robert Moore Report which MAC adopted (leaning too heavily, I believe on suggestions of Executive Director William Davis) eliminated Hume's position as director of research and evaluation. If there ever was a time when MAC should hang on to a man of Hume's professional qualifications, that time is now.

Hume, with his skill and computer technique, was beginning to get a project evaluations MAC has lacked for two years. I had hopes from him of getting an actual accounting of exactly what good has been accomplished with the expenditure of $8 million.

I'm still going to demand such statistics and evaluation —but I doubt I'll get what I need to prove to the citizens of this community how many families in poverty have been helped to move to the dignity of self-support and the status of contributing members of society.

Even so, I'm hopeful about MAC—but March 1 will be a very interesting date.

N.T. 1-27-67

MAC Votes To Curb Briley Appointment Right

The Metro Action Commission voted bylaw changes last night which would strip Mayor Beverly Briley of his power to appoint the commission's chairman.

In the future, the chairman will be chosen by the full 45-member commission, Nashville's coordinating agency for the local War on Poverty.

IN ADDITION, the commission approved other bylaw changes which would limit the power of the chairman and greatly enhance the voice of individual commissioners in MAC affairs.

The bylaws will go into effect after the commission is reorganized along lines laid down by federal law and interpreted by the regional Office of Economic Opportunity in Atlanta. This reorganization presumably will be carried out by March 1.

In a lengthy meeting last night at Head School, the commission also voted to accept a committee recommendation that William B. Davis Jr., executive director of MAC, be "commended."

COMMISSION MEMBER Inman Otey attempted to block a vote on the motion to accept the commendation made by a special committee appointed to probe federal officials' charges that Davis is incompetent.

THE MOVE to limit the power of the chairman in the future was an outgrowth of feeling by some commission members that the chairman was too powerful.

Under the bylaws approved last night:

- The chairman will not be permitted to appoint MAC's standing committees. These committees will be elected by the commission as a whole.
- The executive committee, which is the primary decision-making body of MAC, also will be elected by the full commission instead of appointed by the chairman.
- All committees will elect their own chairmen. In the past, the Rev. Davis automatically has been chairman of the executive committee.

The bylaw changes also will permit the commission to reorganize its membership to permit this city's poor people to choose at least one third of MAC's members.

CECIL Branstetter, chairman of the bylaws committee, said last night he hopes this process of choosing the poor can get under way by Feb. 15 to meet the March 1 deadline.

If the poor are not elected by March 1, Nashville will lose its poverty programs, according to OEO officials in Atlanta.

Nashville Tennessean 1/29/67 Tenn - DOPE

Equality Fight Must Be Won, Relations Unit Told

By TOM INGRAM

The fight for equality of opportunity, ignited by the American Revolution, must be won regardless of how much legislation it takes, the president of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations said yesterday.

"I think we have talked ourselves out on a limb," said Mrs. Martha Ragland, "and we are going to have to put up or shut up."

She added, however, in her afternoon speech before the council, engaged in a two-day meeting at the Andrew Jackson Hotel:

"IT IS A DARK irony that now we so often seem to be cowering in neurotic fear before the forces to which we gave the original impetus."

Mrs. Ragland's talk, as well as the purpose of the organization she heads, dealt with the general field of civil rights —from the Negro revolution to the poor man's fight to exist within the inner city's slums.

She called on the Tennessee legislature to act in the areas of education, aid to families with dependent children, minimum wages and unemployment insurance.

She also attacked the hindering "far right" forces that "label as 'Communistic' any person, organization or institution working for progressive measures."

MRS. RAGLAND described the civil rights fight as an ever expanding situation. To solve one problem reveals a cause that is then another problem to be solved, she said.

The slum dweller's domestic environment as well as his school must be improved and aid to dependent families must create initiative, not merely provide existence, she said.

"As the 1967 Tennessee legislature meets," she said, "I hope there will be evidence of strong citizen support for significant improvement in our public schools."

"But . . . " she added, "those who live in slums and ghettoes . . . will not have the motivation, the energy and health to take advantage of the schools, however good they might be."

SHE CHARGED that city officials must do more than just move the poor out of their environment to build "expensive apartment houses, hotels and office buildings."

The government must do more than move the poor from one deplorable situation to "large complexes of barrack-type public housing, that intensify the concentration and the problems of the poor," she said.

Solution lies, instead, she said, in involving the underprivileged in "self-help" programs and "to see that the values of our society apply to them, too."

This philosophy of involvement, however "has almost scared some city officials to death," she said. "The last thing they want is for a disadvantaged group to get organized."

SHE ADDED, "The fearful mayors feel about this just like the Roman emperors did about the Christians. But to introduce a cheerful note here, I should point out that mayors don't feed present day dissidents to the lions. They just intimidate and discredit them."

She said Americans who extol self-reliance and initiative are the same ones who "lament about three generations on relief yet at the same time condone a grudging, stingy welfare program that guarantees that its recipients will not graduate from its rolls.

"This government-sustained poverty has been coming into focus and it is becoming clear that we must raise, not just a little, but to a decent minimum our welfare and public assistance grants and Social Security."

Describing increased aid to families with dependent children as the "most imperative need," she said, "Our 1967 legislature can do something about this—and will, if there is enough public support for it."

Mrs. Martha Ragland

"It is a dark irony"

MANY PEOPLE who live in poverty have worked all of their lives, she said, but cannot raise their status because they are being paid "substandard wages."

NASHVILLE BANNER
APRIL 28, 1967

MAC Left With Breach After Debate

By DICK BATTLE

A strong bid to replace the Rev. J. Paschall Davis as Metropolitan Action Commission chairman ended near midnight Thursday in a temporary deadlock and with the commission split sharply on the chairman's right to complete his tenure of appointment.

The nominating committee headed by Mrs. Raymond Waller will seek a conference with Mayor Beverly Briley for "clarification" of administration appointments to MAC including his appointment in August 1966 of Davis as chairman from a list of three submitted by the commission.

The stalemate left MAC without effective standing committees and with what is apparently a breach that cannot be easily closed.

Consultants sent to Nashville by the Atlanta regional office of the Office of Economic Opportunity to evaluate MAC programs were present at the meeting.

Mrs. Allee Mitchell, OEO consultant for Head Start programs; and Dr. Samuel Hand, consultant for Neighborhood Services, will meet at 1 p.m. today with the commission sitting as a committee of the whole.

It is possible the consultants will suggest Nashville is not ready for a "poverty war" program. Such a recommendation could result in halting all OEO-subsidized programs.

On the other hand, Briley has indicated he may be approaching the point where he will recommend breaking off the OEO program from this end of the contract.

'Disgusted'

Briley, commenting on the meeting, said he was "completely disgusted." He said:

"The Metropolitan Action Commission was created by ordinance, (Substitute Bill No. 64-312 signed by the mayor Aug. 28, 1964) and the Commission must abide by it.

"Until that ordinance is repealed or amended by the Metropolitan Council, it is the ordinance under which the commission operates. I have no choice but to be governed by the provisions of the ordinance. I would suggest the members of the commission go back and read the ordinance and see what it says."

He pointed out that neither he nor any member of his administration had attempted to interfere with MAC's operation or to control its policies, programs or decisions.

'Appointments'

"I have made appointments to the commission from names submitted and I appointed all those elected from the 'target areas.' I have no wish to dictate to MAC or control its action."

Questioned about Dr. Lou Silberman, who was not reported as a MAC member on a list of 39 members transmitted to MAC Thursday by the mayor's office, Briley said:

"I did not reappoint Dr. Silberman. He is not a member of the Metropolitan Action Commission and I have no intention of appointing him."

Thursday night, with the assent of Chairman Davis, Silberman was seated as a member with full voting privileges on the basis of his nomination from the Nashville Human Relations Council.

Leaders

Silberman and Mrs. Waller were leaders in the fight to elect nominees presented by the committee Mrs. Waller heads.

The Rev. Mr. Davis and Cecil Branstetter, commissioner and chairman of the current bylaws committee, headed the opposing faction. The chairman argued the nominating committee had no authority to submit the names of Mrs. Robert Lagemann and the Rev. Andrew White as nominees for chairman and vice chairman respectively.

Branstetter and Chairman Davis took the position that no vacancy exists in the positions of chairman and vice chairman (Dr. S. O. Roberts) until their terms expire. They insisted the officers must be elected by the commission at its annual election session in September.

Mrs. Waller and Silberman, supported by a majority of the members, took the position OEO guidelines overruled any conflicting provisions of the Metro ordinance. MAC's new bylaws, approved by 'OEO's Atlanta office, they insisted, require a full-scale election of chairman, vice chairman, all standing committees and all committee chairmen as soon as possible.

Audience

A strongly partisan audience in the Lentz Health Center auditorium gave frequent noisy applause to Mrs. Waller, Silberman and others supporting their arguments.

Most of the 150 people in the audience were protesting OEO's withdrawal of funds for Neighborhood Opportunity Centers at nine community centers.

After an open hearing during which former commission member Mrs. John C. Hull, chairman of the Neighborhood Opportunity Center ad hoc committee, and others strongly urged continuation of the NOC programs, Mrs. iMtchell and Dr. Hand were introduced, and MAC staff director Ed Phillips reported on Head Start and other programs.

After a variety of motions attempting to maneuver an election of the committees and committee chairmen, and other motions to defer for legal opinions, a motion by Mrs. Waller to proceed with the complete election carried 17 to 12.

Argument

Chairman Davis turned over the chair to Roberts. Another hour of but there was election. The confusion argument followed ended with a 27-vote majority supporting Mrs. Waller's motion to adjourn with the stipulation the commission sit as a committee to meet today with the two OEO consultants.

The consultants indicated MAC might want another special session after the committee meeting.

Chairman Davis said if a special meeting was necessary after the nominating committee's meeting with Briley he would call a special meeting.

NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
APRIL 28, 1967

1 of 2

TENNESSEE

MAC Chairman Fights Ouster Try

BY FRANK BEILER

The Metro Action Commission's nominating committee launched a bid last night to remove the Rev. J. Paschall Davis as MAC chairman—despite Davis' protests that such action would be illegal.

In a surprise move, the six-member committee tried to replace Davis with Mrs. Robert Lagemann, a commission member who also serves on the Board of Health.

DAVIS, WHO has held the chairman's post—through appointment by Mayor Beverly Briley—since August, 1965, reacted angrily and told the commission:

"My position has not been up for grabs. It's still not up for grabs."

The Rev. J. Paschall Davis
Not up for grabs

Davis argued that he was appointed by Briley last October to serve another one-year term as MAC chairman. The commission cannot overturn the mayor's appointment, he argued.

After four hours of heated argument — punctuated by clapping and shouting from the audience of about 150 persons—the commissioners adjourned without resolving the question.

BEFORE adjournment, the commission voted unanimously to meet with Briley to discuss the attempt to replace Davis.

Mrs. Raymond Waller, chairman of the nominating committee, reminded the commissioners that Briley recently announced he would not object to MAC choosing its own chairman and vice chairman.

In the past, Briley has appointed the chairman of MAC. But according to new bylaws recently approved by the Atlanta regional Office of Economic Opportunity, MAC must choose its chairman.

Davis argued last night that a new chairman cannot be elected until MAC holds its annual meeting in November or until he resigns. He then [illegible] and does not intend [illegible]

DAVIS ATTEMPTED to block consideration of the nominating committee's move by ruling it out of order. His action was challenged, however, and on a vote to decide whether Davis' ruling would be upheld, Davis lost by 16 to 13.

The commission then voted to meet with Briley to determine his views about the matter — especially in regard to his announcement in support of MAC choosing its own chairman.

"But we would be putting the mayor on a spot," commission member Inman Otey argued.

"So what?" asked Ed Shea.

"We talk about him (Briley) like a dog," said Mrs. Charles

Turn to Page 11, Column 1

Toms. "We might as well have him here."

THE FIGHT to oust Davis was led by those who were recently elected in neighborhood polls by the poor, and by those on the commission who worked hardest for the elections.

Several commission members argued that MAC should be free of any control from the mayor, but the Rev. A. M. Walker warned:

"You will not cut his (Briley's) voice — not as long as he is mayor of this city."

The mayor's influence on MAC was first weakened by new bylaws which established a reorganization of the commission. Under the new bylaws, which went into effect March 1, the nominating committe is supposed to nominate candidates for all committee chairmanships. All of MAC then vote on the nominees.

UNDER THE OLD procedure, the mayor appointed the chairman and the chairman named all committees.

The second reversal for the mayor was when Atlanta ordered that at least one-third of MAC's members be elected from the city's poor neighborhoods.

Previously Briley had been allowed to appoint all members of MAC.

The mayor at first opposed

Briley Raps MAC Election

By WAYNE WHITT

Mayor Beverly Briley said yesterday Washington could have its War on Poverty money back before he would "wreck" the local effort by popular election of members of the agency administering the program.

"The election of the members of the Metropolitan Action Commission (the Nashville agency for the War on Poverty program) would turn this worthwhile effort over to the ward heelers and place it right in the middle of politics," the mayor said.

"This would wreck the program, and I will not have any part in anything which would damage it, much less wreck it.

"WE'RE interested in doing something to relieve poverty here, not in the bunch of foolishness we have been getting. You can imagine what would happen if we turned this multi-million dollar program over to the ward heelers."

The U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity has made $8.1 million available to MAC for fighting poverty in Nashville-Davidson County. Through last Nov. 30, Briley said, 75,369 persons had benefited.

MAC has been having problems with the Atlanta regional Office of Economic Opportunity, but now has funds to operate through March.

There has been insistence that at least one-third of the members of MAC be elected from the poverty areas.

"I'M NOT about to put voting machines out and let members of MAC run for election," Briley said. "If there are any voting machines put out for such an election, Atlanta is going to have to conduct the election. I don't even know who would be qualified to vote."

The mayor said persons from the poverty areas are serving on

(Turn to Page 13, Column 7)

Nashville Tenn Wednesday Jan 11, to 1

Briley Raps MAC

(Continued From Page One)

MAC and have a voice in the program here. There are 11 members on the committee from the so-called target areas.

"These people have been recommended by various groups and agencies in the area," Briley said. "I don't even know some of them. They were recommended from the sections, and I placed them on the agency."

He said he believed this complied with federal regulations since there are several methods by which representatives from target areas can be selected.

"WE HAVE a good program here and we are succeeding," he added. "People from Atlanta and Washington have said we are doing a good job. I don't know what has caused some of our difficulties with the Atlanta regional office.

"No one has been here from Atlanta to see me except a public relations man who came up here, and he said we were right.

"I'll go to Atlanta or Washington or wherever I have to, to keep the program going.

"We've kept this program out of politics. There is not a single political appointee on MAC. I don't know how any of the MAC members voted, and I don't care. I don't know whether they voted for me last year or not. I know this, not a one of them was actively involved in my campaign.

"BEFORE I'LL see this program wrecked, they can take their money and take it back to Washington," he added.

Guidelines established by OEO provide several methods for the selection of representatives from target areas. Briley said he is certain the method used here is in keeping with the guidelines.

"I don't anticipate any further problems on this," he said, "but I am making my position clear.

"We have able persons serving on our action commission," Briley said. "They are charged with the responsibility of administering the program. They are doing a fine job. I have not attempted to interfere or to dictate to them in any way. I have left them alone.

THE MAYOR said all minority groups are represented on the commission as well as the poverty areas.

MAC members are:

The Rev. J. Paschall Davis, chairman.

The Rev. W. A. Alexander, 901 37th Ave., N.

The Rev. William L. Barnes, 1502 Edgehill Ave.

James Beerman, 761 Wedgewood Ave.

Attorney Cecil Branstetter, 216 Third Ave., N.

Henry Burkitt, with the state employment security department.

Pete Charlet, 2700 Franklin Road.

J. T. Edwards, 631 N. First St.

Lilman Esters, 834 40th Ave., N.

Mrs. L. M. Freeman, 820 S. 6th Court.

Ollie Frith, 1719 West End Ave.

Mrs. Lettie Galloway, 1812 Morena.

Miss Katy Gore, youth employment specialist with the state employment security department.

Attorney Frank Gorrell, American Trust Building.

William V. Harper, 1021 College Ave.

Dr. John Harris, director of schools.

Mrs. John C. Hull, 1616 17th Ave., No.

Mrs. Vivian Hunley, 1610 Delta Ave.

Dr. A. P. Johnson, 1820 Charlotte Ave.

Mrs. Robert Lagemann, member of the Metro health board.

Mrs. Lou Ella Lewis, 451 13th Ave., N.; Dr. Freeman McConnell of the Bill Wilkerson Speech and Hearing Center; Architect Calvin McKissack, Morris Memorial Building; Charles Miller, 226 Capitol Blvd.; Dr. Jack Miller, Peabody College; Inman Otey, real estate developer; Dr. S. O. Roberts, Fisk University; Attorney Harold Seligman, 1808 West End Building.

Ed Shea of the Nashville Area Chamber of Commerce; Dr. Lou Silberman, Vanderbilt University; Mrs. Kirkland Todd Sr., 2300 Golf Club Lane; Sylvan K. Small, jeweler; Dr. Sam Smith, 4109 Kimbark Drive; Raymond J. Swain, 184 Wharf Ave.; Leslie Vantreasa Sr., member of the Metro Hospital Board; Archie Walker, 1625 17th Ave., N.; Mrs. Raymond Waller, 4025 Franklin Road; the Rev. Andrew White, 1621 Haynes Meade Circle; Mrs. Eva Whitson, 163 University Court; A. C. Wilson, 310 Hurst Drive, and Cecil Wray, 814 Church St.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

NB- 1-27-67

New Bylaws Will Conform With All OEO Wishes: MAC

By JACQUE SROUJI

Members of the Metropolitan Action Commission approved new bylaws Thursday which they said would "conform" with Office of Economic Opportunity regulations and "assure" elected representation.

The lengthy session at Head Elementary School was attended by members of the commission and poverty officials from throughout Nashville.

Cecil Branstetter, chairman of the bylaws committee, said the actions were aimed at meeting all federal objections to the local poverty program. "Now we are conforming with the law and can expect them (bylaws) to go into effect by March 1," he said.

The vote was 15 to 3 in favor of the bylaws, with two abstentions.

Elections

Under the regulations, one-third of the commissioners would be elected from major public agencies and community groups; one-sixth, major public officials or representatives of major public agencies concerned with poverty; one-sixth, community groups, and one-third, poor areas.

The Rev. Paschall Davis, MAC chairman, and Baxton Bryant, executive director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, expressed optimism over what they termed a "new spirit" now working in the Nashville poverty program.

"I have been encouraged this week, partly by the things I have read in the paper, of your leadership (Paschall Davis), of leadership I think has begun to create a different atmosphere," Bryant said.

'Fussing, Feuding'

The Rev. Mr. Davis said in the past too much time had been spent "just knit-picking, fussing and feuding. There are some things we must get straightened out and for a month at least let's just get together and work on our problems."

Commission member Inman Otey presented allocation of funds from the program development committee.

Otey said $450,000 has been earmarked for the Head Start program for 5-year-olds; $350,000 Head Start's 3-5-year-olds; $125,000 for MAC administration; $200,000 for combined neighborhood services; and $75,000 for family planning for at least six months at which time he said other funds would be available.

Mrs. Kirkland Todd said 500 volunteers were already on the house-to-house poverty area survey which will eventually cover 33,000 homes and 107,000 residents.

The survey information is to be used in planning for the spring and summer Head Start programs.

NB 1-19-67

For Family Planning

Unexpended Funds OKd By Atlanta

By DICK BATTLE

Dr. Joseph M. Bistowish, Metro director of health, said Wednesday he had learned from the Atlanta Office of Economic Opportunity "our famliy planning program can be funded from unexpended funds of the Metropolitan Action Commission."

The health director said the statement made to him by Mrs. Carolyn Martin, Tennessee coordinator for OEO, contradicted statements made to him last week by MAC executive director William B. Davis Jr. and deputy director Nat Williams.

Fighting for continuance of the program now funded through Feb. 28, Bistowish said he would report his findings to the MAC project review committee meeting this afternoon in the hope "we can at least obtain funding for this program through the next six months." He said he estimated it will require approximately $75,000 to finance the program for six months or about $150,000 to carry it a full year.

Davis told THE BANNER: "Nat Williams talked to Mrs. Martin after she talked to Dr. Bistowish last Friday. She said it was 'legally possible' to use unexpended funds to finance the family planning program but she was waiting for additional information from OEO in Washington relating to guidelines and regulations before giving us such a commitment in writing."

The MAC director said as soon as "we can get something in writing from Atlanta we'll know just what we can do."

He said the family planning program "is an excellent program and we want very much to be able to continue it. If there are any funds available, either unexpended funds or funds from any other sources, I would certainly recommend to the commission that the program be funded and continued."

Davis said the program funding is now being audited and it was not yet possible to report how much there will be in unexpended funds by the end of February. The Atlanta OEO office has authorized extension of OEO funded programs—including family planning — through Feb. 28.

The committee meeting this afternoon will consider funding and extension of all OEO programs beyond the Feb. 28 cutoff date.

In addition to family planning these include Neighborhood Opportunity Centers, Information and Education, Foster Grandparent, Headstart and Enable. The latter has already been ordered discontinued by OEO. It involves case work with multi-problem families in poverty areas.

Bistowish said the family planning clinics organized by his department are now serving 4,800 women.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Nashville Tennessean
5-1-67

Briley Ripped In MAC Action

Nth 5-1-67

By GEOFFREY COOPER

The newly formed Community Improvement Association adopted resolution last night attacking Mayer Beverly Briley for his failure to appoint a duly elected representative to the Metropolitan Action Commission.

The agency made the resolution defending the election of Lou Silberman, of the Tennessee Human Relations Council, to MAC its first official act.

The statement said:

"THE COMMUNITY Improvement Association condemns the mayor for his failure to appoint a duly elected representative of the Metropolitan Action Commission.

"We feel that this action is clearly in violation of reasonable federal standards and is typical of this administration's efforts to seriously support a program to improve the lives and conditions of the people to be served by the Economic Opportunity Act."

The meeting at the Edgehill Methodist Church was attended by 50 persons representing neighborhood improvement groups, professional social work agencies, clergymen and others.

The Rev. Bill Barnes, one of the group's organizers, explained the purposes of the meeting:

"THE MEETING tonight representing different organizations in different parts of the city represents a growing awareness that the problems of the poor will never be dealt with until there is a unified effort made.

"By unified, I mean all of the organizations from all over the city which are fighting for the cause of the frightened, oppressed persons of the city."

The theme of the meeting was explained in the use of two words which speaker after speaker used—"fragmentation" and "frustration."

The fragmentation is the division of effort of members of the Negro community, although each group is working toward the same goal. The frustration comes about when each small group tries to deal with city and state officials alone, according to the speakers.

IN URGING the groups to unite, Mrs. Matilda Osborne, of the United Helping Hand, said, "The poor people have nothing to offer you as leaders, but you have something to offer them."

Councilman Mansfield Douglas cautioned the group against over-enthusiasm when he said, "There are no simple problems, and therefore no simple solutions."

Baxton Bryant, executive director of the Tennessee Human Relations Council, who attended the meeting, said:

"THERE HAS been some doublecrossing and doubledealing taking place between the mayor and what he's agreed to do," he said. "And in my opinion the mayor's action in not appointing Lou Silberman is for the purpose of deliberately picking a fight with a private agency — the Tennessee Council of Human Relations."

"If this is his intent, he will certainly get a fight," he said.

Bryant said he thought the city was in grave danger of losing all OEO funding because of Briley's action.

He said he would give the background of the dispute in a press conference to be held at 11 a.m.

NASHVILLE
TENNESSEAN

MAY 2, 1967

MAC Aides Called Sheep

Nat. 5-2-67

[illegible]

The [illegible] director of the [illegible] council on Human Relations [illegible] Action [illegible] Mayor [illegible] shown [illegible] the [illegible] chairman.

At an afternoon press conference first [illegible] yesterday morning, Baxton Bryant said a majority of MAC [illegible] by Briley [illegible] whether the poverty agency can select its own chairman.

BRILEY WAS reportedly out of the city last night and could not be reached for comment.

Last Thursday MAC's chairman, the Rev. J. Paschall Davis, beat back at least temporarily an attempt by members of the commission's nominating committee to replace him. The committee tried to kick Davis, a Briley appointee, out and substitute Mrs. Robert Lassmann, a MAC member. After hours

(Turn to Page 8, Column 4)

Binkley all will serve until [illegible] when the posts will be filled [illegible]

MAC Aides Called Sheep

Nat. 5-2-67

(Continued From Page One)

of debate, the commission voted to meet with Briley on the matter.

Yesterday, Bryant charged Briley with being "paternalistic" and with "not telling the truth, and that would be lying."

The relations council official also said Davis is more paternalistic than the mayor.

Following is the text of Bryant's prepared press conference statement:

"The mayor has deliberately violated the Metro Action Commission bylaws approved by the Metro Action Commission and accepted by Atlanta as a pre-requisite for approving our new conduct and administration grant of $[illegible]

"UNDER THESE bylaws, the commission has the right and responsibility to elect its own chairman and officers. The target areas and public and private agencies would elect or select their own representatives and the mayor would appoint them pro forma.

"When the mayor says he has claimed no authority over the conduct of the Metro Action Commission, he does not speak the truth and he knows it. To illustrate, on Monday night, January 23, the bylaws committee met and argued for four hours.

"The so-called power structure group defeated attempts to change the bylaws to provide that the commission elect its own officers and committees and that proper representation be given to target areas and private agencies.

"On January 24, the director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations and Mr. Dick Battle had a conference with the mayor and the mayor agreed to the above changes. This was received . . . in Mr. Battle's column on Wednesday, January 25.

"The power structure commission members were told to change their stand and without even calling a bylaws committee meeting, the above changes were penciled into the draft at the regular commission meeting on January 26.

"THE MAYOR reversed his position in a private conference and supported [illegible] bylaws group without consulting with the previous majority, and they like wise carried out the mayor's reversal when in the Thursday night nominating committee. The mayor has now reversed himself again and [illegible] over 5[illegible] Metro Action Commission representatives sent to Atlanta on February 28. Thus, the conduct and administration grant was received under false pretenses by the mayor.

"Only an aroused community with the participation of the poor can save the poverty program."

Bryant said the mayor probably has the good of the community at heart but he has a paternalistic personality.

Bryant said he did not know if the mayor would reverse his present stand and that he would like the mayor and a public agency to be part of the poverty program.

"THEY HAVE to be part of it, along with the poor and private agencies, for OEO to accept a program," he said.

Bryant said the controversy dates back to 1964 before the federal guidelines. The council resolved then that the mayor would appoint MAC members and the chairman.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

ASKS Poverty War Emphasis

No Cause To Quit: Davis

NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN

May 2, 1967

No Justification To Quit: Davis

By FRANK SUTHERLAND

The chairman of the Metro Action Commission said yesterday he sees "no justification" for him to resign because "certain factions and misguided individuals" want to run the War on Poverty in Nashville.

The Rev. J. Paschall Davis, appointed to his post by Mayor Beverly Briley, said the mayor has no "legal authority or power" to appoint a new MAC chairman before Davis' term ends in September.

DAVIS' STATEMENT came a day after Baxton Bryant, executive director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, charged that a majority of MAC members have followed Briley "like sheep" on the question of whether the antipoverty agency can select its own chairman.

The confusion resulted after the OEO regional office in Atlanta insisted that the commission elect its chairman by secret ballot. The MAC bylaws approved by the Metro Council were amended to that effect last February, but Davis contends that the amended bylaws do not call for an election until the regular meeting next September.

(Turn to Page 14, Column 5)

(Continued From Page One)

Last Thursday, Davis beat back an attempt by the commission's nominating committee to replace him. After hours of debate, the commission voted to meet with Briley on the matter.

YESTERDAY, DAVIS said "I sincerely believe that what Nashville and Nashville's poor need most, is not a new MAC chairman, but commissioners joining hands with each other and the poor in pressing on with our great, joint mission."

Bryant charged Monday that Briley was "paternalistic" and "not telling the truth." He also said Davis is more paternalistic than the mayor.

Following is the text of Davis' statement released yesterday:

THE PEOPLE of Nashville are entitled to a statement explaining why I insist on holding my office as chairman of Metro Action Commission. It may appear to some that the poverty program would progress more to their liking if I would step down and permit MAC to elect a different chairman. Others may suspect that my motives are selfish and that my behavior is undemocratic or contrary to the best interests of the poor and of the public.

The appointment to the office of chairman of MAC is a public trust and an opportunity for service. My acceptance of that office was also an acceptance of heavy responsibility and an agreement to serve the full term to the best of my ability. This position carries no pay or pecuniary compensation, which accentuates, and certainly does not alleviate the moral responsibility assumed upon acceptance.

METRO ACTION Commission was created by Ordinance 64-312 passed by the Metro Council and adopted on Aug. 28, 1964. All its actions, including its bylaws, are subject to and must be in compliance with the enabling ordinance. That ordinance provides that "the Mayor shall appoint the chairman for a term of one year." The bylaws cannot change this provision and do not even attempt to do so.

At the termination of my first year as chairman, in accordance with the bylaws then in force, I was elected by the full commission, at its annual meeting in September, 1966, as one of three candidates from whom the mayor was requested to select the next chairman. I was duly reappointed chairman for a term of one year ending in September, 1967.

In February, 1967, the bylaws of MAC were amended at the insistence of the OEO regional office in Atlanta to provide that the chairman shall be elected by secret ballot of the MA Commission. The mayor has agreed to exercise his power under the ordinance, hereafter, by appointing as chairman the person duly elected for that office under the bylaws.

THERE WAS NO agreement to an immediate election, and the bylaws do not provide for any such election prior to the annual meeting in September, unless and until the office of chairman becomes vacant. The office is not vacant. An election at this time is, therefore, unathorized and out of order. Even if a new chairman were elected, the mayor would have no legal authority or power to appoint him to the chairman ship before September, unless the office is vacated sooner.

No one has advanced any sound reason why the mayor should remove me, if he could, or why I should resign as chairman of MAC; and I do not see how, under all these circumstances, I could vacate the office in good conscience. I have never agreed with the regional office, or with the mayor, or with anyone else, that I would resign or stand for election prior to this coming September.

The job of chairman is not easy, or particularly pleasant. Nor can we view with pleasure the prospect of my continuing in office until September, with the majority of the commissioners still refusing to get on with the job—the big and important job before us. I sincerely believe that what Nashville and Nashville's poor need most is not a new MAC chairman, but commissioners, joining hands with each other and with the poor, in pressing on with our great, joint mission.

IN SUMMARY: I never asked for the chairmanship. It was offered to me, "out of the blue," as a call to unselfish service for this whole community. I accepted it as such and have tried sincerely to devote that office, as well as my whole life, to the ministry of reconciliation of man to God and of man to man. I admit to my own impatience, frustrations and outbursts of anger, along with other personal failings and inadequacies. But that all goes to show that much remains in that great ministry of reconciliation yet to be done in and through all of us, including me.

There appears to be no justification or sound reason for surrendering this public trust and responsibility, or for abandoning the problems and difficulties emerging with "maximum feasible participation," just because certain factions and misguided individuals have combined their forces for the ostensible purpose of running the poverty war in Nashville to their own satisfaction.

UNTIL WE ARE given reliable evidence that, without me, the poverty program will progress faster, more effectively and more fairly, in furthering the well-being of the poor and in keeping with the interests of our whole community, I must continue to serve out my full term as chairman of MAC. This duty and responsibility is owed to all the poor and to the entire community, with its duly elected officials, as well as to my fellow MAC commissioners and to our loyal staff.

NT MAY 5, 1967

Dr. Silberman Insists He's Still on MAC

By FRANK RITTER

Dr. Lou Silberman, president of the Nashville Christian Leadership Council, said yesterday that he considers himself a Metro Action Commission member — despite Mayor Beverly Briley's statement that he is not.

"I don't want to make a big to-do about this," Silberman added. "But if the mayor can disregard my election to MAC and refuse to appoint me, then he can disregard the election of all other members of the commission, and we will be back to where we were before."

SILBERMAN SAID he was elected to MAC by the leadership council which he heads. The council is listed in MAC's bylaws as one of several which shall have representation on the antipoverty commission.

Briley, however, has stated that he did not "appoint" Silberman to MAC, that he has "no intention" of appointing him, and that Silberman is not a member of the commission.

Asked yesterday if he would ignore Briley's statement and continue to serve on MAC's 40-member board, Silberman replied:

"THAT'S HOW I am proceeding. I assume I am a member in good standing until steps are taken to establish that I am not a member.

"I am proceeding on the assumption that my agency (the leadership council) has fulfilled its obligations according to MAC's bylaws and its manual of procedure."

At its last meeting, MAC voted to seat Silberman as a member of the commission, pending clarification of his status on MAC. Silberman was the one who raised the question about his status.

SILBERMAN, along with all other MAC members, submitted his resignation in February to take effect "if and when the mayor publicly announces that he has accepted it and is making a substitute appointment."

Briley accepted more than 20 resignations and listed these in a letter sent to MAC's chairman, the Rev. J. Paschall Davis. Silberman's name, however, was not included in the list.

Since Briley made his new appointments March 1, the Atlanta regional Office of Economic Opportunity has been notified that Silberman is a MAC member. And MAC officials were under the impression that Silberman was a member until Briley made his statement about Silberman's status last Friday.

IN OTHER developments yesterday, the Rev. J. Paschall Davis announced there will be a special MAC meeting at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday at Lentz Public Health Center.

At that time, there is expected to be a showdown between a faction inside MAC which is seeking to replace Davis as chairman of MAC, and a faction opposing the move.

The commission's nominating committee, which first proposed replacement of Davis by Mrs. Robert T. Lagemann, is scheduled to meet at 230 p.m. today with Mayor Beverly Briley to hear his views.

Briley has already indicated that he is opposed to the move to replace Davis who was appointed by Briley to the chairman's post last year for a 12-month term.

AT THE LAST MAC meeting, a majority faction in MAC voted to proceed with election of a new chairman. New MAC bylaws call for election of the chairman — but the question is whether he shall be elected before the commission's annual meeting in September.

Silberman said yesterday he will not be able to attend Tuesday night's MAC meeting — and because of this, a showdown on his status with the commission may be avoided.

Silberman added that he will be attending the annual meeting of the Nashville Community Relations Council at Christ Episcopal Church.

NASHVILLE BANNER MAY 6, 1967

MAC Decision On May 25 To Guide Program's Future

By DICK BATTLE

A decision May 25 by the Metropolitan Action Commission for or against immediate election of a new chairman will determine the future of the local program attacking causes and problems of poverty.

The MAC nominating committee, headed by Mrs. Raymond Waller, conferred with Mayor Beverly Briley Friday for "clarification" of the Mayor's attitude concerning his appointment of a MAC chairman as opposed to the new by-law requirement that the commission elect its own chairman.

The committee will report to the full commission when MAC meets in regular session Thursday, May 25 at 7:30 p.m. at the Lentz Health Center.

The Facts

These are the pertinent facts developed from the meeting:

- The mayor stated he was "bound by the terms of the ordinance" (Substitute Ordinance 64-312 dated Aug. 28, 1964 establishing the commission). The ordinance says the "Mayor shall appoint the chairman for a term of one year."
- The MAC by-laws adopted as amended on March 16, 1967 and subsequently approved by the regional (Atlanta) Office of Economic Opportunity provide, "the chairman . . . shall be elected by the full commission, by secret ballot."
- A letter to MAC chairman J. Paschall Davis dated May 3, 1967 from J. M. Merrell, Jr. OEO deputy regional director states: "It was and remains the intent of OEO once your Board of Directors was restructured to comport with CAP Memo 57, a majority of the Commission's Board of Directors should decide when to invoke its power to select the Chairman and Vice-Chairman. Specifically in answer to your question, this means that the power of the Commissioners under that revised by-law to select their own presiding officers must prevail regardless of the term of office being served pursuant to an appointment to these offices by the Mayor under the old by-laws."

Opinion

- An opinion from the Metropolitan legal department in reply to a request by Chairman Davis states: "In as much as you were duly appointed by the Mayor for a one year term and reappointed for successive terms of one year, your status is that of Chairman of this Commission which will continue for the remainder of the one year term, from the date of your last appointment."

The opinion, signed by Director of Law Neill S. Brown and deputy director Felix E. Polston, adds: "It might be said some that the change in the By-laws . . . would prevail. However, such is not the case. It is a fundamental principle of law that a public agency cannot act beyond the scope of the powers delegated to it by the legislative body. Elliott Nat'l Bank vs. W. Atlantic R. R., 70 Tenn. 676."

Briley said he would be "subject to ouster" if he failed to comply with the ordinances and the charter of Metropolitan government. He said he would "work as closely as I can (with MAC and OEO within the frame work of that ordinance . . . I won't amend it by my own action."

Anticipates Change

The mayor told the committee he anticipated changes in the OEO act by Congressional action. He said the anti-poverty program problems brought to light locally "are not confined to Nashville . . . they are occurring all across the nation." He said he had no desire to control or direct the affairs of MAC and he was more interested in programs to relieve conditions of poverty than "superficial arguments" or any "power structure."

Mrs. Waller read a letter she had sent to the Mayor summarizing the differences in opinion and the problems confronting the nominating committee. She and other members of the committee stated there was no intent by the committee to project a "factional" power struggle within the commission or a conflict with the Metro administration. She and other members of the commission stated they had worked in "good faith" through several meetings to present a list of nominees by "democratic" processes.

Mrs. Waller offered the summary of the meeting: "The ordinance is saying one thing and the (OEO) regional office is saying another and it will cut off funds if we don't comply . . . we cannot work within the by-laws at any point where they differ with the ordinance." Committee member Inman Otey said: "I think we may be able to work this out some way."

Since the May 3 letter from Atlanta leaves the time of electing a MAC chairman up to the commission, it appears possible to some MAC members to hold the election at the expiration of the term of the present chairman and still comply with both guidelines and by-laws.

Could Appoint

A chairman elected by MAC could be "appointed" by the Mayor as a pro forma act subsequent to the election by the

After the meeting with Mayor Briley Mrs. Waller called a meeting of the nominating committee for two o'clock Sunday afternoon at Wesley House community center on University Court.

MAC CHAIRMAN FIGHTS OUSTER TRY

2 of 2

Ousted

the elections and said the federal government could keep its antipoverty money. He later altered this view, however, and said he would appoint to MAC those people elected by the poor neighborhoods.

THE FIGHT launched last night to oust Davis was seen as another step toward lessening Briley's influence—although he still will be permitted to name two-thirds of MAC's membership.

In other action, the commission voted to meet at 1:30 p.m. today with consultants from the Atlanta office to discuss this city's Head Start and Neighborhood Opportunity Centers programs.

Both programs will be suspended in the near future, OEO has warned, unless they are revamped. The consultants arrived in Nashville this week to work with MAC to do this.

The meeting of MAC last night originally had been called to vote on the nominating committee's recommendations for all the commission's six committees.

WHEN THE question arose about the chairmanship, the vote on the committees was held up. The commission then adjourned before taking action on the committees.

No date for the meeting with Briley has been set. Mrs. Waller and other commission members emphasized, however, that it is important to act as soon as possible to keep MAC moving.

At several points during the debate last night, the audience was so loud that proceedings were drowned out.

Once, commission member Cecil Branstetter told the audience that if they could not behave, they should leave. A few minutes later, Davis admonished Dr. Lou Silberman, another commission member, because Silberman's comments had drawn audience applause.

SILBERMAN SHOOK his fist at Davis and shouted:

"I did not invite the audience here! I did not ask them to clap!"

The audience reacted with the loudest and most prolonged applause when Mrs. Zulee Ursery, a recently elected commission member spoke. With great emotion she told the group:

"I would like to make an observation as one of the poor community. I have never in all my years seen anything so disorderly and disorganized as the actions by you well-to-do people here tonight.

Briley Heads MAC Toward OEO Crash

NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN

MAY 6, 1967

By FRANK RITTER

Mayor Beverly Briley, insisting that the Metro Action Commission cannot elect a new chairman now, set MAC on collision course yesterday with federal antipoverty officials.

Briley, meeting with the MAC committee which recently launched a bid to elect a new chairman, said the local ordinance establishing MAC takes precedence over MAC's bylaws.

"ANY MAYOR," Briley added, "is bound by the ordinances. There is an ordinance creating MAC, and I couldn't amend it, even if I wanted to."

The mayor cited a ruling by the Metro legal department saying the ordinance must prevail over new MAC bylaws. The ordinance says Briley shall appoint the chairman. MAC's new bylaws, however, call for election of the chairman "by the full commission by secret ballot."

Briley appointed the present chairman, the Rev. J. Paschall Davis, last year to a 12-month term. The mayor insisted yesterday that Davis may continue as head until MAC's next annual meeting, in the fall.

A LEGAL opinion from the regional Office of Economic Opportunity, however, says MAC may select a new chairman whenever its majority wishes. Copies of the opinion, signed by J. M. Merrell Jr., deputy regional director, were released at yesterday's meeting.

The commission's right to select its own presiding officers "must prevail" regardless of the mayor's appointment of the chairman last year, the opinion concluded.

Most of the members of the MAC nominating committee — headed by Mrs. Raymond Waller — were noncommittal yesterday after their meeting with the mayor.

"WE PLAN TO hold a meeting at 2 p.m. Sunday at Wesley House Center," said Mrs. Waller. "We hope to decide at that time what our future course of action will be."

Presumably, the committee will decide whether to disregard Briley's opposition and recommend that the full commission go ahead and elect a new chairman. The full commission will meet at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday at Lentz Public Health Center.

The nominating committee recommended at MAC's last meeting that Davis be replaced by Mrs. Robert T. Lagemann. The committee decided to meet with Briley to determine his views.

IN A LETTER which Mrs. Waller read yesterday to the mayor, the committee members stated their views this way:

"The committee worked in good faith (in nominating Mrs. Lagemann). However, it is understood that if the commission does not conform to Atlantas' guidelines, funds will be cut off, and the people of the neighborhoods will lose the hope that has been brought by such programs as Head Start, neighborhood centers, family planning and others."

The committee said it recognized the "seeming conflict between the enabling local ordinance and the (MAC) by laws." It added, however, that Briley had previously been quoted as stating he thought election of the chairman was possible.

IN RESPONSE to Mrs. Waller's reading of the letter, Briley spoke out angrily and told the committee:

"I'm not concerned about your fight over the power structure. This commission (MAC) has given me more trouble than all other commissions in the local government combined."

Briley said that some people "think I control the MAC commission," and added:

"I'm interested in the programs and not in all these superficial arguments about who is going to run the programs."

BRILEY THEN launched an attack against Baxton Bryant, executive director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations. Bryant criticized the mayor last week for what he termed Briley's breach of promise concerning election of a new MAC chairman.

"One character," Briley said, "has been on TV, calling me a liar. I'm really proud of some of the enemies I have made and this is one of them—this advisor to Stokely Carmichael."

Briley did not mention Bryant by name but it was obvious to whom he was referring. Bryant, asked for comment, replied:

"I AM NOT one of the mayor's enemies—I'm one of the poor's friends. I am sorry that the mayor counts as an enemy all those who support maximum participation by the poor in true democracy.

"The only way that the poor can get power to help determine their own fate is for the mayor to give up some of his. And it is clear that this he will refuse to do."

When the nominating committee launched its effort to remove Davis from the MAC chairmanship post, Davis argued that such a move would be illegal.

Davis said his job was "not up for grabs" and that he did not intend to step aside. A majority of the commissioners however, voted to hold an election for chairman, as well as all other officers and committees for MAC.

Continue Cited

NASHVILLE
TENNESSEAN
MAY 8, 1967

Civil Rights Chiefs Clash

By GEOFFREY COOPER

Two civil rights figures clashed last night on the possibilities of the federal government immediately funneling a private agency with funds to administer the poverty program if the Metro Action Commission should lose federal funds.

Dr. Joseph Heffernan, of the University of Tennessee's School of Social Work and one of the organizers of the Community Improvement Association, challenged Baxton Bryant, executive director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, on Bryant's assertion that a group such as the association could and should be ready to move in if MAC is forced out.

HEFFERNAN SAID he had spoken with John Dean, an official with the Atlanta regional office of the Office of Economic Opportunity, at 7 last night, and he quoted Dean as telling him:

"To transfer the Community Action program funds from a public body would be, under the best circumstances, a long, arduous business."

Bryant leaped to his feet and shouted:

"Dean told me just the opposite."

A heated discussion followed and the meeting at the Edgehill Methodist Church calmed down only when Bryant and his wife left, shortly thereafter, saying he had to attend another meeting.

ATTENDING THE meeting were 35 Negroes and whites representing various neighborhood improvement groups, professional groups, clergymen and other interested parties.

The newly formed association was established to unite the various neighborhood groups in attacking problems of the poor.

In other action, the group adopted a resolution attacking the "double standard" of

(Turn to Page 2, Column 8)

Mayor Beverly Briley in allowing MAC Chairman Paschal Davis to keep his post, when the other commission members had to be elected.

The resolution said:

"THE COMMUNITY Improvement Association believes that all Metropolitan commissions, including the Metropolitan Action Commission, should have the right to select their own chairman in a democratic manner.

"We therefore urge the mayor to take all necessary steps so that the Metropolitan Action Commission may function in a democratic manner."

In discussion preceeding the adoption of the desolution, Heffernan said the group did not necessarily want Davis removed as chairman. He said the group wanted the commission to have the right to vote for their own chairman.

Earlier in the meeting, the group appointed a committee, headed by the Rev. Bill Barnes, to write a charter for the organization and take whatever steps necessary to proceed with the incorporation of the association.

Incorporation became necessary when the possibility of funding from private sources became apparent, Heffernan said.

NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
MAY 7, 1967

Improvement Group To Study Action Commission Problems

The Community Improvement Association will meet in Edgehill Methodist Church at 8 p.m. today to explore the background and alternatives to current problems plaguing the Metro Action Commission.

Dr. W. Joseph Heffernan, temporary chairman of the association, said the meeting will seek "to explore the background of current MAC difficulties and to explore alternatives to the apparent extreme positions held by both Mayor Beverly Briley and Baxton Bryant."

BRYANT, EXECUTIVE director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, said Briley's "breach of promise" concerning election of a new MAC chairman to replace the Rev. J. Paschall Davis.

Briley, in turn, has attacked "one character," obviously referring to Bryant, as an "enemy" and an "advisor to Stokely Carmichael."

Bryant has answered that he is not an enemy of Briley's, but "one of the poors' friends" who is "sorry that the mayor counts as an enemy all those who support maximum participation by the poor in true democracy."

[illegible] participating in the program today.

Asked if Briley had been invited, Heffernan said he had not, "but I'll be glad to extend to him an in vitation personally."

(C+d) TENNESSEE

HUMAN RELATIONS

NASHVILLE—DAVIDSON COUNTY, TENNESSEE

1967

Beginnings

America's cities are in trouble. That is no alarmist's cry but rather an obvious fact. While much of our attention has been focused on wars overseas and on the developments of suburbs in this country, problems of the inner cities have built up explosive pressure. Cities such as Nashville confronted with this painful fact can choose any of several courses of action. The most enlightened approach is to admit the existence of critical problems in employment, housing, education, and police-community relations—and to go all-out in attempting to solve those problems.

Whatever else can be said about them, the problems of America's cities in the 1960's involve human relations: mutual confidence or distrust, communication or isolation, good will or ill will. No city dare disregard this dimension of its corporate life. Disregarded, human relations inevitably deteriorate. But by directing careful attention to the relations between races, religious groups, and socio-economic groups in the community, the city can build a healthy society that will provide basic satisfactions for all its citizens.

Nashville's community leaders undoubtedly had this in mind when they pressed for the establishment of a Metropolitan Human Relations Commission. Members of the Council who introduced Bill No. 65-697 on November 16, 1965, were Z. Alexander Looby, Mansfield Douglas III, John L. Driver, Glenn Ferguson, James L. Warren, and Harold M. Love. After being passed on third reading on December 21, it was approved and signed one week later by Mayor Beverly Briley.

An Ordinance Establishing the Human Relations Commission of the Metropolitan Government of Nashville-Davidson County

WHEREAS, prejudice and the practice of discrimination against any individual or group of persons because of race, creed, color or national origin, is morally wrong and is detrimental to the peace, progress and welfare of the community; and,

WHEREAS, the inability of any individual to fully participate in the privileges of complete membership in the community diminishes the benefits of the common effort for all its citizens; and,

WHEREAS, a permanent organization is needed within the government to study the problems of human relations and to take positive action to eliminate discriminatory practices within the territorial boundaries of the Metropolitan Government;

BE IT ENACTED BY THE COUNCIL OF THE METROPOLITAN GOVERNMENT OF NASHVILLE AND DAVIDSON COUNTY:

SECTION 1. There is hereby established a Metropolitan Human Relations Commission. It shall consist of fifteen (15) members who shall be broadly representative of the several social, economic, religious, cultural, ethnic, and racial groups which comprise the population of the General Services District of the Metropolitan Government. The mayor shall appoint the members of the Metropolitan Human Relations Commission subject to confirmation by a majority vote of the whole membership of the Council. Of the first fifteen (15) members appointed, five (5) shall be appointed for one year, five (5) shall be appointed for two (2) years, and five (5) shall be appointed for three years; after the first appointments, all appointments shall be for a term of two years. Every member shall have been a resident of the General Services District of the Metropolitan Government for at least one (1) year prior to his or her appointment and shall continue to be a resident of the General Services District of the Metropolitan Government so long as he or she shall serve as a member of the Metropolitan Human Relations Commission. In the event a vacancy is created on the commission by the death, incapacity, or resignation of a member or by the failure of a member to continue to reside in the General Services District of the Metropolitan Government, his or her successor for the unexpired term, shall be appointed in the same manner as original appointments.

SECTION 2. Eight (8) members shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of meeting and transacting business.

SECTION 3. The Commission shall elect a chairman and such other officers as it shall deem necessary. The chairman of the Commission shall appoint such committees as the Commission may deem necessary in order to carry out its functions.

The Commission shall employ such persons as may be necessary to perform its functions and as may be within the limits of its budget appropriations.

SECTION 4. The Commission shall promote and encourage fair treatment and equal opportunity for all persons and shall promote mutual understanding and respect among all members, all economic, social, racial, religious, and ethnic groups; and shall endeavor to eliminate discrimination against, and antagonism between, religious, racial and ethnic groups and their members.

In performing its functions, the Commission shall have the powers and duties:

(a). To conduct or arrange for research projects and studies into and public reports on discrimination and progress in equal opportunity in the community.

(b). To receive and investigate complaints of, and to initiate its own investigations into, discrimination and intergroup tensions and antagonisms.

(c). To hold public or private hearings to determine the facts about instances of discrimination or intergroup tensions.

(d). To recommend methods for elimination of discrimination and intergroup tensions, and to use its best efforts to secure compliance with its recommendations.

(e). To cooperate with other intergroup relations agencies, both public and private, on the city, state and national level in performing its functions under this ordinance.

(f). To cooperate with the various departments, agencies, and boards of the Metropolitan Government and of the State in effectuating the purposes of this ordinance.

(g). To enlist the support of civic, labor, religious, professional, educational organizations and institutions in community activities and programs that will further the goals of this ordinance.

(h). To organize community committees and councils that will work toward the goals of this ordinance.

(i). To recommend legislation to the Council, and modes of executive action to the Mayor, that will effectuate the purposes of this ordinance.

(j). To receive grants and donations from foundations, institutions, organizations, and individuals for carrying out its functions subject to the approval of the Metropolitan Council.

(k). To submit an Annual Report of its activities and of the progress and problems in intergroup relations in the community to the Mayor and Council.

(l). To adopt, promulgate, amend and rescind rules and regulations to effectuate the policies and provisions of this ordinance.

SECTION 5. The Commission shall prepare annually a budget for the ensuing fiscal year, and shall submit such budget to the Mayor and the Council for their approval.

SECTION 6. The Mayor shall provide suitable office space and facilities for the Commission.

SECTION 7. This ordinance shall take effect from and after its passage, the welfare of the Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County requiring it.

SECTION 8. If any provision of this Ordinance or the application of any provision or provisions to any person or circumstance shall be held invalid, the remainder of the Ordinance or the application of the ordinance to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SECTION 9. The existence of the Commission, and its duties, powers, and functions, shall terminate five years from the effective date of this ordinance, unless extended by affirmative vote of the Metropolitan Council.

The Commission

Chairman: Dr. Edwin H. Mitchell
Associate Professor of Radiology,
Meharry Medical College

Vice-Chairman: James F. Neal, Attorney
Cornelius, Collins, Neal, and Higgins
Also, lecturer at Vanderbilt University Law School

Secretary: Robert J. Warner, Jr., Attorney
Dearborn, Berry, and Warner

JAMES C. BARBOUR
Vice-President, Equitable Securities Corporation

CECIL D. BRANSTETTER, ATTORNEY
Branstetter, Moody, and Kilgore

H. MAX DE HAVEN
Gates Rubber Company
Formerly, President of Nashville Central Labor Council

RABBI RANDALL M. FALK
The Temple—Congregation Ahabai Sholom

REV. J. F. GRIMMETT
Pastor, New Hope Baptist Church
Also, Assistant Professor and Acting Director of Pastoral Studies, American Baptist Theological Seminary

MRS. C. M. HAYES
Homemaker and Civic Leader

DR. JAMES R. LAWSON
Acting President, Fisk University

GREENFIELD PITTS
First Vice-President and Treasurer,
Harvey's Department Store

EDWARD J. SHEA
Executive Vice-President, Nashville Area Chamber of Commerce

DR. G. J. TARLETON, JR.
Chairman, Department of Radiology,
Meharry Medical College

FOY VALENTINE
Director, Christian Life Commission,
Southern Baptist Convention

REV. ANDREW WHITE
Executive Secretary, Division of Christian Education, AME Church

Advisory Members

Rev. Beverly Asbury
Public Accommodations

Rev. Will D. Campbell
Public Accommodations

Dr. John D. Hopkins
Housing

Rabbi Jerome Kestenbaum
Education

F. Clay Bailey
Employment

Rev. Frank Grisham
Education

Mrs. Arthur Hopkinson
Housing

M. D. Neeley
Education

Mrs. Richard Bauer
Education

Dr. Alexander Heard
Education

Joe Kelso
Employment

Dr. Robert Newbrough
Housing

J. William Perry

Dr. Edwin Mitchell (right) receives a plaque designating him as Nashville's "Citizen of the Year" for 1967. J. F. McClellan presents the plaque on behalf of Frontiers International.

The Staff

WARREN N. MOORE
Executive Director

Born in Memphis, the son of a minister, Warren N. Moore attended public schools in that city and graduated from LeMoyne College. He did graduate work at the Interdenominational Theological Center in Atlanta, and was an exchange student for the school year 1963-64 at Mennonite Biblical Seminary. Following this, he served as Race Secretary for the General Conference of the Mennonite Church in 1964-65, lecturing on race relations.

Mr. Moore was employed as assistant director of the Memphis Urban League in 1965, and in that same year was awarded a "Key to the City of Memphis." Later in 1965, he became Assistant Director of the Tennessee Commission on Human Relations and director of the Commission's Memphis Field Office. Upon resignation of the Commission's director at the end of December, 1966, Mr. Moore became Acting Director—a post which he held until assuming his duties with the Metropolitan Commission in March, 1967.

Mr. Moore is the staff specialist in problems of employment, housing, and police—community relations.

FRED CLOUD
Associate Director

Mr. Cloud refers to himself as "a Tennessean by adoption," having spent all his adult life in this state. A graduate of Vanderbilt University and of the Vanderbilt Divinity School, he earned a further graduate degree from Scarritt College in 1961. His professional career has included seven years of pastoral service in Methodist Churches in Nashville and other cities of Middle Tennessee; stints of teaching at Vanderbilt, Scarritt, and the Nashville Center of U.T.; and fourteen years as editor of young adult publications for the General Board of Education of The Methodist Church. He came to the staff of the Commission in February, 1967.

Mr. Cloud is the staff specialist in education, public accomodations, communications, and interfaith relations.

MRS. WILLIAM A. STROUD
Secretary

Although a native of Kentucky, Mrs. Stroud has lived in Nashville for more than twenty years. For ten of those years she served as secretary to the Rev. Sam R. Dodson, Jr., at Calvary Methodist Church.

Mrs. Stroud is married to William Andrew Stroud, a loan service representative for the Veterans' Administration.

Housing

One of Nashville's most urgent needs is for housing for the poor. Not just any kind of housing, nor located just anywhere, but housing that will help to build self-respect, that will prevent either the appearance or the reality of racial containment, and that will help persons to break out of the poverty cycle.

Under the leadership of Commissioner James C. Barbour, chairman of the Committee on Housing, the Human Relations Committee devoted much time and attention to problems of housing during 1967. A principal focal point of attention was the Edgehill Urban Renewal Project. On November 18, 1966, Mayor Briley referred to the Commission a formal complaint filed with him by the Edgehill Committee protesting the location of 500 units of low-cost public housing in the 5-17 and 5-18 sites of the Project. Commission Chairman Edwin H. Mitchell appointed an Edgehill Subcommittee — composed of James C. Barbour as chairman, Max DeHaven, Rev. J. F. Grimmett, Dr. James R. Lawson, and James F. Neal — to obtain detailed information and submit a report and recommendations. This Subcommittee held a public hearing, made inquiries, studied information available to it, and developed a set of principles regarding the construction of public housing upon which to base its recommendations. Those principles are:

1. The need for public housing in several areas of Metropolitan Nashville is urgent and the Edgehill area is one of those in which the need is greatest and most immediate.

2. Public housing should be so located and designed as to promote the maximum physical comfort and opportunity for social and cultural development consistent with the economics of construction and occupancy. Both short term and long term social and economic effects on the occupants and the community as a whole should be considered in this connection.

3. Experience in public housing in many cities has indicated that excessive concentration of housing for the very poor tends to perpetuate a "culture of poverty" and the social ills inherent in it, such as low achievement, delinquency and family instability.

4. Discrimination on the basis of race in public housing is contrary to law and to effective community development, but segregation exists de facto in many housing projects in Nashville and throughout the country. To an extent this is attributable to historical residential habits of ethnic groups. The Negro differs from most other ethnic groups, however, because his mobility is restricted by color as well as by economic and social restrictions he shares with others.

5. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and revisions in Federal housing laws and regulations have introduced new social elements into the planning of public housing which should be considered in both current and long term planning of the Nashville Housing Authority and other involved agencies of the Metropolitan Government.

On the basis of the above-listed principles, the Subcommittee made the following RECOMMENDATIONS:

1. That the Nashville Housing Authority, in view of the urgent need for housing, proceed as promptly as possible with the construction of approximately 180 housing units on one or both of the 5-17 and 5-18 sites in the Edgehill Urban Renewal Area, preferably the 5-18 site to avoid placing them adjacent to existing public housing. It is hoped that these units can be constructed in dispersed groupings for perhaps 60 to 90 families each.

2. That studies be initiated by the Authority to consider the feasibility of providing greater dispersal within the Edgehill area of the proposed additional 320 units and of introducing into the area housing for families of moderate income in order to avoid excessive concentration of housing for the very poor.

3. That the Housing Authority and other involved agencies in the Metropolitan Government review their planning with the objective of providing public housing more varied as to location, design and method than heretofore.

4. That in studying and determining the economic feasibility of various housing plans the Authority consider the possible long term costs to the community of low achievement, delinquency and family instability which are frequent results of poorly planned housing.

5. That when formulating plans the Authority continually have in mind the social effects of racial

Housing

"Two Skylines," by Tom Little. Reproduced by permission of the Nashville Tennessean.

discrimination in housing and the intent of the laws and regulations relating thereto.

6. That in the interest of community understanding the Authority expand its efforts to keep residents of affected areas informed at all stages of urban renewal projects; that it also develop a broader program with community agencies to facilitate relocation of families required to vacate existing housing.

7. That qualified social scientists be retained by the Authority in connection with the study of these recommendations and be employed in all other current and future planning.

On January 10, 1967, the Human Relations Commission heard the report from its Edgehill Subcommittee; the report, containing the above recommendations, was approved and was forwarded to the Mayor, in line with his request.

On February 3, Commissioner Barbour reported that Mr. Gerald Gimre evidenced a desire to meet the recommendations of the subcommittee in regard to the dispersal of the planned public housing in the Edgehill Urban Renewal Project. Further planning by experts would be necessary; but pending this, some start on public housing within the Edgehill Project would be needed. The Edgehill Subcommittee of the Human Relations Commission therefore concluded that:

1. The Nashville Housing Authority should proceed to build approximately 180 units of public housing on the 5-18 site beginning on its eastern side and building in a westward direction. The planning and building of the approximately 180 units should be accomplished in such a way that the remainder of the 5-18 site, after the 180 units are constructed, could be utilized for further public housing or for other purposes, depending on the findings of the study mentioned below.

2. Contemporaneous with the building of the approximately 180 units, the Nashville Housing Authority should undertake a study, with consultants, if necessary, of the feasibility of dispersing the remaining approximately 320 units of public housing throughout the Edgehill Project. This study should be conducted with the original report and recommendations of the sub-committee in mind.

Through its Housing Committee, its Chairman, and its Staff, the Human Relations Commission continued throughout 1967 to engage in conversations, committee meetings, and hearings with local and Federal housing officials regarding the most desirable approaches to housing for the poor. It participated in the Conference on Housing February 9 and 10 at Vanderbilt University, sponsored by Mayor Beverly Briley and Congressman Richard Fulton.

The Commission continued to press for its recommendation of dispersal of public housing, so as to prevent either the appearance or reality of racial containment; and for social and economic mixture of population so that poor people would not be surrounded exclusively by other poor people. The Commission sought to make the total community aware of the danger of constructing ghettos, whether racial or economic. Racial minorities, and the poor of whatever race, should not be made to feel that they are rejected by the larger community or that they are being kept in a cage. Nashville's concern with human relationships should include certainly the relationship of members of minority groups to the total community; and patterns of public housing are an important expression of the city's concern for its citizens, whatever their race or economic level.

According to local newspapers, in July 1967 the Department of Housing and Urban Development accepted the Commission's recommendations regarding dispersal of public housing and socioeconomic mixture in the Edgehill Project area.

Employment

Employment is a key not only to the problem of poverty in Nashville but also to the problem of intergroup relations. Members of minority groups —and especially Negroes—experience real difficulty in securing employment appropriate to their level of education. It is not uncommon for college-educated Negroes to be employed in relatively menial positions. Furthermore, while Nashville's rate of unemployment for the total community is relatively low, it is much higher for the Negro population. And under-employment (by which is meant having to hold two jobs in order to earn a living wage) is very common among members of the Negro community.

The Metropolitan Human Relations Commission committed itself during 1967 to seeking passage of two equal employment opportunity ordinances for Nashville-Davidson County. At its meeting of July 25, the Commission requested the Committee on Employment, of which the Rev. J. F. Grimmett is chairman, to prepare a position paper on employment. A working paper on "Employment in Metropolitan Nashville" was developed; and, after consideration of the paper by the Commission at its meeting of October 24, the Commission voted to have the staff develop model ordinances for consideration at the next meeting.

The Committee on Employment made its report to the Commission on November 28 concerning the recommendation of equal employment opportunity ordinances for Nashville-Davidson County. After a discussion of two model ordinances prepared by the staff, the Commission adopted a resolution requesting the staff to communicate to the Human Relations Committee of the Metropolitan Council that the Commission recommends that two ordinances be drafted and considered by the Council. The first would require non-discriminatory hiring practices on the part of all persons and companies having contractual relationships with the Metropolitan Government, and the second would provide for non-discriminatory hiring practices generally throughout the Metropolitan area as a supplement to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, providing for local conciliation and local enforcement and covering firms employing eight or more persons.

The staff requested a conference with the Human Relations Committee of the Metropolitan Council, James LaPenna, Chairman, to present the Commission's request for the equal employment opportunity ordinances for Nashville-Davidson County. As 1967 ended, such a conference was being arranged.

Education

Metropolitan Nashville, like most cities throughout America, has had some unhappy encounters between citizens and policemen. Charges have been made against policemen that indicate a need for improved communication and an increase in appreciation for the policeman's role, on the one hand, and a greater sensitivity to how persons—especially members of minority groups — think and feel, and why they react to certain situations as they do, on the other.

Following the disturbances in north Nashville in early April, 1967, the Committee on Education of the Human Relations Commission—under the chairmanship of Dr. James R. Lawson—proposed to the Commission at its meeting of April 25 a program of human relations training for police officers. Mayor Bevely Briley and Police Chief H. O. Kemp, who attended the meeting at the invitation of the Commission, expressed strong interest. Mayor Briley made a statement to the Commission indicating his determination that police training in the field of human relations should be improved and that the Police Department and the Human Relations Commission should enter into cooperative efforts in this regard. The Commission then voted that the staff, in coordination with the Police Department, should explore means for providing on a local basis opportunities for the police to be exposed to courses, seminars, and other training in the field of intergroup relations on a continuing basis.

After conferences with Captain John Sorace, the staff secured the services of Dr. J. Robert Newbrough, Director of the Center for Community Studies at Peabody College, and Derek V. Roemer of the National Institute of Mental Health, both of whom had given leadership in police human relations training programs, to help design a program for Nashville. Dr. Newbrough lined up a team of social scientists—including sociologists, anthropologists, psychologists, and psychiatrists from Peabody College, Vanderbilt University, Fisk University, Meharry Medical College, and Tennessee A & I State University—to provide leadership for the training sessions. At its meeting of June 27, the Commission approved in principle the human relations training program for police officers, and requested that the program proceed.

During the balance of 1967, the staff conferred a number of times with the Police Department, and with Dr. Newbrough and his team of social scientists, to perfect the design of the training program and to work out a schedule for the inauguration of the program. Initially set for late December, 1967, at the request of the Police Department it was re-scheduled to begin early in 1968.

Attitudes are formed early in life. References to ethnic groups in history and social studies textbooks in public schools, therefore, take on great importance, for they subtly influence the attitudes of the readers toward persons of other races or nationalities. At its meeting of October 24, the vice-chairman of the Committee on Education—Dr. G. J. Tarleton, Jr.—reported to the Commission that textbooks used in the public schools need to be examined to determine their fairness to ethnic groups, and that recommendations should be made to the State Textbook Committee regarding textbooks that are multiethnic in approach. He reported that the staff had been in conference with a highly qualified research specialist who was willing to make the needed study of textbooks used in public schools in Tennessee (elementary through high school) if funds could be secured for the project. The Commission approved the plan in principle and authorized the staff to seek the funds to implement it. Efforts to secure funds to underwrite this project were still being made as 1967 ended.

In August, 1967, the staff proposed to the Commission that a "Consultation on the Communications Media and Human Relations" should be held. It was pointed out that the mass media of communication—especially radio, TV, and newspapers—have profound effects upon the attitudes which persons adopt toward members of racial, socio-economic, and religious groups other than their own. At the same time, they are powerful forces in establishing the self-images of members of the various groups in the community.

Since attitudes usually are expressed in actions, the ways in which the mass media in Metropolitan Nashville present news and editorial views have far-reaching implications for intergroup relations in our community. If distorted stereotypes of members of a given racial, socio-economic, or religious group are projected by the media, those persons will be treated unfairly, unjustly, and sometimes inhumanly, by those whose attitudes have been shaped by the distorted images. Conversely, balanced and fair reporting-in-depth can build good relations across lines of race, religion, and socio-economic class.

The "Consultation on the Communications Media and Human Relations" will be designed to bring to the level of awareness in the minds of local leaders in the mass media the effects that their manner of operation has on intergroup relations locally (and, to an extent, nationally and internationally). Further, it will project some criteria for performance by reporters, photographers, TV cameramen, newscasters, and publishers. Finally, it will begin the process of developing a strategy for improvement in intergroup relations through responsible use of the mass media. This proposal was approved by the Human Relations Commission on August 22, 1967. Shortly thereafter, the staff conferred with the officers of Sigma Delta Chi, the professional fraternity for persons in the mass media, and Sigma Delta Chi graciously agreed to co-sponsor the Consultation. Several planning meetings were held in the fall months of 1967; it was hoped that the Consultation could be held in the spring of 1968.

Public Accommodations

In its efforts to secure equal rights for all citizens in Nashville, the Human Relations Commission received and investigated a number of complaints from individuals who had been denied equal access to public accommodations at various times during 1967.

Allegations of discrimination were made with regard to ambulance service, swimming pools, skating rinks, and self-service laundries.

In each instance, the staff informed the offending party of the provisions of the Civil Rights Law of 1964 and the allegation of discrimination, and urged compliance with the law. In more than half the situations, owners or managers—when confronted by the staff of the Commission with the complaints—agreed to comply with the provisions of the law and signed conciliation forms. In some instances, where the offending party was adamant, the case was referred to the office of the United States Attorney, Department of Justice.

Redressing individual grievances, important as it is, is not enough to improve the social health of Nashville. The Human Relations Commission is dedicated to moving beyond mere responding to complaints to the initiation of positive programs which will change attitudes and practices that deny any group of persons the full and free exercise of their citizenship rights.

Urban Projects, Inc.

Urban Projects was a natural outgrowth of a perceived need on the part of the Human Relations Commission. As summer approached, it was apparent to the commission and its staff that a variety of creative activities should be planned for the more disadvantaged children and youth in Nashville. A "natural" activity would be swimming. Beginning from this premise, the staff conferred with staffers of the Metropolitan Welfare Commission, the Metro Beautiful Commission, and the Metropolitan Board of Parks and Recreation. The outgrowth of this conference was a cooperative swimming project, which the Human Relations staff gave the title "Project Y.E.S." (Youth Earning to Swim).

Project Y.E.S. was reported to the Commission on June 27, 1967. It was approved, and an allocation of $300. was made from the Human Relations Commission's budget to get the project started. Harvey's, Cain-Sloan's, and the Life and Casualty Insurance Company made substantial contributions. The plan was simple: children and youth gathered up a shopping bag of litter from their yard, the street, or their neighborhood. They exchanged the bagfull of litter for a coupon which admitted them to three swimming pools, Howard, Hadley, and Rose. Thus, children between the ages of 12 and 17 could swim daily, if they so desired, without financial cost to them, while at the same time helping them to learn habits of industry and personal responsibility.

The project was supervised by volunteers from private and public agencies in Nashville. Some one-thousand children engaged in Project Y.E.S. between June 26 and August 1. This particular project indicated the nature of Urban Projects: they are "pilot projects," carried out cooperatively with other agencies insofar as possible.

Urban Projects, Inc., was chartered by the State of Tennessee on July 19, 1967. Incorporaters were Dr. Edwin H. Mitchell, James F.

Neal, Robert J. Warner, Warren N. Moore, Fred Cloud, and Edward J. Shea.

As the Charter states, Urban Projects, Inc., was set up for the purpose of the "support of charitable undertakings" within the meaning of Tennessee Code Annotated Par. 48-1101, including, but not limited to, engaging in work projects, recreational projects, and educational projects to benefit youth; and the "promotion of education" within the meaning of Tennessee Code Annotated Par. 48-1101, including, but not limited to, engaging in adult literacy campaigns, human relations education and training for police officers, and consultations on the mass media; and the support of such other philanthropic, educational, and cultural activities as the membership may deem appropriate.

The second project which the Human Relations Commission sought to enterprise through Urban Projects, Inc., in 1967 was a "Consultation on the Mass Media and Human Relations" (described in this report in the section on "Education"). The staff sought, and secured, funds to underwrite the cost of this consultation. A third approved project is a "Study of Textbooks for Fairness to Ethnic Groups" (also described above); however, as 1967 ended, funds to underwrite this project had not yet been secured.

A fourth project, approved in principle by the Human Relations Commission but not funded by the end of 1967, is an Adult Literacy Campaign, to be carried on in conjunction with the Metropolitan Board of Education, and with the Meharry Comprehensive Health Project. The basic approach would be to recruit and train college students to help functional illiterates to become literate, tying this project to the objectives of employment, voting, and improved personal and family health.

Contributions from interested individuals, groups, and foundations are welcomed. They may be sent to: Urban Projects, Inc., 1034 Stahlman Building, Nashville, Tennessee 37201.

Staff Activities

Human Relations as a professional discipline is concerned with the quality of relationships between all racial, religious, and economic groups in the community. For this reason, one of the ways in which the staff works is through participation in meetings, conferences, and committees of schools, churches, boards, agencies, and institutions in Metropolitan Nashville-Davidson County.

During 1967, both the Executive Director and the Associate Director spoke upon many occasions to groups of citizens in schools, churches, colleges, and civic clubs in Nashville. In addition, they participated in conferences on housing, anti-poverty programs, employment programs, and public education.

Both the Executive Director and his Associate were selected for participation in an intensive study seminar on "The Metropolitan Area: Its Prospects and Problems," held in Washington, D. C., under the sponsorship of the National Institute of Public Affairs; and both became Associates in Urban Affairs of N.I.P.A.

Both staff directors were active during 1967 in the professional association in the human relations field — the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials. In addition to attending the national conference of NAIRO, held in Detroit in November, both participated actively in the Nashville Chapter of NAIRO, the Associate Director serving as Chapter Chairman during 1967.

The staff of the Human Relations Commission spends much time in cooperative work with other agencies. For example, the staff worked with the Metropolitan Action Commission in the development of their summer program for 1967; and the Associate Director served as publicity director for the program, placing news stories in the papers and spot announcements on radio and TV. During September, the staff helped with the orientation for new VISTA workers, and provided a brief internship (ten days) for one VISTA, Miss Jan Atkinson.

Nashville was one of the first group of cities chosen to receive planning grants under the Model Cities Act. The staff of the Human Relations Commission was asked to help with this program, since citizen participation is a key factor in the success of this program. Ideas for services and facilities are to be generated as much as possible by persons in the target areas to be served. The Executive Director took part in a number of conferences as well as in committee meetings for the discussion of the Model Cities program, during 1967.

Whenever and wherever tension arose between groups in Nashville during 1967, the staff was vitally involved. During the disturbance in North Nashville in April, the staff worked both "on the spot" and through its office facilities to help restore lines of communication between contending groups. And in the more protracted struggle over the location of Interstate Highway 40, the staff and the chairman of the Commission attended numerous committee meetings and hearings, attempting to help clarify the "human dimensions" of the problem posed by the routing of the highway. At its meeting of October 24, the Commission voted to send a letter to the I-40 Steering Committee, expressing the Commission's support for a ninety-day delay in the letting of contracts on I-40.

Some of Nashville's citizens were engaged in taking a long hard look at our city's problems during 1967. For some, this was prompted by an awareness that we have large unresolved problems facing us; for others, it was forced by the logic of events, by the nationwide rising tide of frustration, dissatisfaction, and hostility between racial and socio-economic groups.

A question that concerns us is: Do we understand the urgency of the situation—the necessity to deal in depth with the unresolved problems of Nashville on an accelerated time scale? There are indications that even now a good many persons seem to wear blinders, and apparently are unaware of the frustrated existence of many persons who live in substandard housing, who are unemployed or under-employed, who experience segregation and discrimination, and who know that these things need not be in a land as wealthy as ours, in a land committed to freedom for all its citizens!

Dr. Edwin H. Mitchell addressing the Nashville Area Chamber of Commerce at its Breakfast Meeting of Wednesday, November 11, 1967, at the Hermitage Hotel

The Negro Community Looks at Nashville — Forward, or Backward?

by Dr. Edwin H. Mitchell

Gentlemen:

In accepting your invitation to address you this morning, I assure you that I am aware of the impossibility of one Negro speaking for the entire Negro community. I assure you too that I do not wish you to accept me as having those credentials, for too often in the past, one Negro, chosen by those in power, has been allowed to function as the expert in racial matters. Many times this practice has been to the detriment of both races.

I will attempt this morning, however, to present to you a picture of the Negro community as it is in the eyes of some of us and as we view it in the light of plans which have been made public. I shall attempt, as well, to indicate your stake in these plans, for, while you speak of a Forward Nashville, there are those of us who see the city poised for a giant step backward.

I shall speak primarily of the 4.3% land area of Davidson County on which is found 35.4% of its total population. For here is situated over half (58.4%) of all the families in the county having an annual income of less than $3,000 and half (49.4%) of all the unemployed within the county. There is no need for us to speculate why so many people, so characterized by poverty are restricted to this small land area when we recognize that over half (53.1%) of all of the housing built before 1939 but only 29% of all the sound housing in Davidson County is found here. But, of course, with middle and upper income orientation to pride in home ownership, one tends to see these thirty year old dilapidated and deteriorating buildings as the end result of the ravages of those who reside therein, conspicuous, in the main, because of their black skins, rather than as having resulted from the onslaught of time. I would remind you that these dwellings represent for their owners a financial investment and that, as businessmen, they do expect and do obtain a return on their investment. The people who live here are truly consumers of the slum rather than producers thereof. Although I cannot tell you the percentage of home ownership in this entire area, I can tell you that only 21% of the homes in North Nashville are owner-occupied. For you to focus in your mind of which I speak, I need only call to your attention that which, as a civic landmark, has risen second in its viewing appeal only to the Parthenon—10th and Herman. I'm sure all of you have seen it.

Now these are things that exist. This is the principal market-place for the poor. And I should like to point out to you the factors that seem to assure that, if Forward Nashville continues in its same direction, this area is not likely ever to be reclaimed as a contributing part of this community.

There now exists, or plans have been publicly announced for them, a total of 5,000 low rent public housing units in the same area, this total not even including several proposed projects for the elderly. These units represent in terms of people better than 20,000 persons whose main requirement for permanent residence is that they remain poor. Parenthetically, there is an undetermined number of persons whose incomes are even too low to afford public housing who inhabit this area. And if a Negro family is able to succeed to the point of affording an $18-20,000 home, and if this family desires to locate this home in the urban community, that family will find lending agencies will not finance such a venture for there is hardly a neighborhood in the central city where even this modestly valued home would not be overpriced in comparison to other homes surrounding it. So the middle class Negro is driven from the city to the affluent black ghettoes that surround it or are driven into second hand, overpriced homes in transitional neighborhoods bordering the Negro slum. Such neighborhoods have been termed "grey" neighborhoods because of the presumed racial mix, but these so rapidly become all black, with the help of certain enterprising realtors, that the term has never become popularized. Negro businesses, which have even less mobility than the Negro family, see their financial stability deserting them as their more affluent customers move out. And when Negro businesses fail to prosper, too often it is attributed to some inherent failure related to race.

Adding to the exodus of the middle class Negro is the destruction of their sound homes within the city by ill-conceived public housing projects that utilize a program of massive clearance to erect huge jungles of compact housing. And such programs seem to be repeated every ten to twenty years. Witness in Edgehill where nearly 1,000 family units of public housing and at least 280 units of additional low rent private housing were planned as almost a continuous unit. And we realize it was not an oversight that allows two contiguous urban renewal plans, one called the University Urban Renewal program and the other the Edgehill Urban Renewal program, to be separated by a high speed boulevard with access between these areas severely restricted. The absence of social concern of our universities is not limited solely to the white community, but there at least was, and the opportunity still exists, a chance for the educated community to lead the way out of the dark ages of racial bigotry. In addition, and even with less regard for those it displaces, super highways form concrete moats between Negro and white communities and tear their way, with no concern for the problems they create, through the heart of existing Negro communities, converting the majority of their streets into blind alleys and affording almost no access. Witness in North Nashville where Interstate 40 has been planned so that as it crosses 26th Avenue North it isolates a community of over 100 square blocks from the local park and public library except for a single walk-over; where only two through roads from the boundaries of Charlotte Avenue and the Clarksville Highway are open in an East-West direction and one of these, Centennial Boulevard, bisects the A and I campus; and where only five streets from the Jefferson Street bridge to 28th Avenue North are open in a North-South direction. There is not now a single through street between North and South Nashville and, as the highway was planned, Eighteenth Avenue, which bisects the campus community of Fisk and Meharry, would have been the only through street. As it crosses Jefferson, it destroys the north side of this main Negro business artery, displacing as it does numerous Negro establishments such as a savings and loan association hardly five years old, a $100,000 physician's clinic complex, a printing company, several churches and professional offices. Contrast this result with the commercial construction boom along West Charlotte where, by locating the highway off the main artery and preserving through streets, the business outlook is strengthened. Gentlemen, you of the Chamber, the city and state administrations endorsed this program. YOU DID NOT SPEAK FOR US!

But we are not blind to the viewpoint that such planning as I have described represents. We see the linking together of the economies of Sumner and Wilson counties with our own by your expressways so that now I can drive in a shorter time to Lebanon than I can to 100 Oaks. We see the leapfrogging of the needy of our community to tap the labor market of these counties. But we see too the residents of these counties taking the tax dollars home in their pockets to build their communities while our poor stay poor.

Repeatedly we hear the cry that everyone who wants to work can find a job and you may even be right. But too many of our people find that it takes two jobs just to acquire bread much less fruit from their labors. 60.3% of all the people in the county working in private households or as service workers or as laborers live in the area under discussion. How much do you pay your maid? Your janitor? Have you ever wondered how they live on their salaries?

But you tell us education is the answer to the problem; the Negro is unprepared! And, to draw an analogy, I am reminded that as early as 1926 Dr. Robert Goddard, an American now regarded as the "father of the modern rocket" built the first liquid fuel rocket. But there was no market for rockets and rocket engineers in America until the German V-bombs created one. Now where is the market for the educated Negro outside those vocations that serve his own people? Let's look at Nashville to see—Nashville, where there are thirteen colleges and universities, integrated, I am sure, because that's what the law requires and we are a law-abiding community. Why else would the Council pass a Riot bill as an approach to our probelms when it has shown a singular lack of legislative concern about other approaches to a solution of the "NEGRO PROBLEM." But I digress.

Let me cite for you figures gathered by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission concerning Negro employment in Nashville businesses. I quote from a newspaper article appearing in THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN, dated Friday, June 30, 1967:

"The EEOC found that eleven Nashville trucking firms with a total of 1675 employees had 138 Negro employees, and that of 311 white collar workers in the firms, none was Negro.

"Twelve Nashville construction firms with a total employment of 1194 workers had 163 Negro employees. In these companies there was a total of 244 white collar workers, of whom one was a Negro."

It continues: "360 Negroes were found among the 5799 employees of eight Nashville manufacturing firms. In these companies, there were 1711 white collar workers, six of whom were Negroes.

"Only 344 Negro employees were found among the 3950 workers in six Nashville retail establishments. In these businesses there were 2946 white collar workers, 61 of whom were Negroes." (end quote)

Now if I add correctly, this means that of 12,618 employees in these establishments, in all of Nashville, with its thirteen colleges and universities, only 68 Negroes were found who were capable of holding a white collar job! And in municipal government, even all the drivers of garbage trucks are white! How much education and what kind of test does that position require? The fact that a job ceiling exists in every phase of employment in Nashville is not hidden from the Negro.

And you say education is the answer? On a national level, the average lifetime income of the Negro college graduate is equal to that of a white eighth grade drop-out! The summer unemployment rate for Negro college students this year was 16.1%; for the Negro high school student, 16.3% No, education is not the answer. Education, plus opportunity is the answer! And until the opportunity is created and, until the Negro student can feel assured that it is not just an illusion, the school drop-out rate will continue to dismay us, and college students will continue to pour off their campuses in protest movements, for one community is not significantly different from any other. Whether they be residents of the city is really not pertinent.

But times are changing we are told on television! And we tell you we have seen them change before. The median income of Negro families nationally rose to a high of 57% of the white income in 1952 and dropped to 53% of the white income in 1962. This reflects the Negro law of supply and demand: last hired, first fired.

Now just because I have focused upon the educated Negro to make a point, do not interpret my remarks to indicate an unawareness of the larger problem. Negroes need jobs NOW! If they are unlearned, teach them! If they are unskilled, train them! Do not hide behind test scores that have no relevance to the job to be performed but rather measure social values of the majority culture.

And when you talk of a Forward Nashville, how can we be convinced when, in thirteen years, of 141 public school faculties 83 are still segregated and, of the 58 that are integrated, 23 have only 1 teacher of a different race. Tokenism may be enough to claim immunity from the law, and, gentlemen, if in all these areas I have discussed this is your intent, I have wasted your time and you mine.

And we see the establishment of a second degree-granting state institution here in Nashville as a continuation of the separate but equal misconception despite Chamber endorsement.

And we cannot accept that the dismissal of a few—and I repeat—a few police officers against whom well documented evidences of brutality have been presented represents a moral problem for the police department that exceeds the moral problem of the community-at-large.

We cannot imagine what manner of Negro man you feel lives here in Nashville when you continue to ignore the examples of Cairo, Milwaukee and Louisville as though Nashville's time is not coming.

Gentlemen, Nashville is indeed fashioning a new face. And it has begun by upgrading of the downtown business area. But tall buildings which allow you to gaze outward upon the green grass of surburbia, cannot long shelter you from the despair, frustration and bitterness that continue to build around you. In a city that unites its governments but leaves its people divided, in a city that provides in the midst of want elegant show houses of luxuries, a cruel mockery is made. But sitting as they are in the midst of all this poverty, your businesses are just such a mockery to so many.

What brave and unthinking men you are!

METROPOLITAN HUMAN RELATIONS COMMISSION

1034 STAHLMAN BUILDING • NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE 37201

PHONES (615) 747-4385, 747-4386

Chattanooga Times
Sunday January 28, 1968

TENNESSEE

—Times-Post Staff Photo by Bob Sherrill.

HUMAN RELATIONS: John Lewis, left, spoke to the 10th annual meeting of the Tennessee Human Relations Council Saturday about "Race Relations Across the South." With him are Dr. William Pollard, center, president of the state council, and Lewis Sinclair, vice president.

Chattanooga Times
Sunday January 28, 1968

Seeking Out, Training City's Poor Is Held 'Tremendously Important'

By MARGARET LEONARD

The Tennessee Human Relations Council, arriving at a "turning point" in its 14-year history, should move to the "tremendously important task" of searching out the urban poor to get them into training for jobs, the council's president, Dr. William Pollard, told the annual meeting at the Patten Saturday.

"Poverty programs can still be funded," Pollard said, "in spite of the budget restrictions. The training programs are a tremendous new resource, but they aren't getting many Negroes into them."

"The cities have great agencies which have been created all for years from the rest of the community. We don't know the

See Page Eight, Column One

SEEK OUT POOR, COUNCIL IS TOLD

From Page One

lives there. There's a kind of conspiracy of lack of concern.

"We must get to know these people and help get them into these opportunities that they don't have any way of knowing about."

Pollard urged every member of a local council to "get to know five families." He said the state council will provide members with information about what training and education programs are available to those families.

According to Dr. Philipp Sottong, president of the Chattanooga Community Relations Conference, the local group may follow a different tack, while still working for employment of Negroes.

Sottong said the local council will form a committee during the spring meeting to "follow up" on the basic employment problems which came up in the [illegible] held Saturday afternoon.

Sottong explained that because action projects "come out of the membership" locally, the "five-family plan" may not be adopted here, unless some of the members decide to take it [illegible]

He feels personally that the employment problem involves a general attitude of exclusion, of rationalizing about why people are excluded, are not utilized."

"CRC tries to knock down the bluff, the rationalization."

He mentioned people who belong to all-white professional societies — doctors, dentists, businessmen. "There are three ministerial groups. One is primarily Negro. Why are they separate?"

Sottong did say that finding the unemployed who need training for jobs "would certainly be a good action project." He predicted that the Chattanooga group would probably adopt some such project.

To Present Award

He announced to the meeting that the Chattanooga group has decided to hold an annual meeting and to award what may be an annual award to the local person who has done most to advance the cause of human relations.

"We're going to use the Nobel prize system. The award will not be automatic. Years may go by without an award."

He said later that it may be "just as important to skip years" without presenting an award, "to show that not a damn thing has been done."

Since the state council was formed in 1954, the nature of its activities has changed several times. Pollard said in the fifties, its purpose was "to provide an opportunity for the two races to get to know each other as persons, and to work together."

In the early sixties, the Council began to support, actively and morally, the sit-ins and other demonstrations designed to change the laws to open public facilities to Negroes.

Long Way To Go

"Since the Civil Rights Act of 1964, we have been trying to achieve compliance with the laws. We still have a long way to go in Tennessee to secure compliance with Title VI of the Act." Title VI deals with equal employment opportunity.

Pollard, an Episcopal minister, said "these people (the ghetto poor) can't be ignored much longer. The judgment is ultimately religious. We're ignoring our common humanity."

John A. Dyer, executive director of Chattanooga Progress Inc., welcomed the meeting in Mayor Kelley's absence. He said "it means nothing if the GNP increased $50 billion last Year," in the light of the unemployed who are still that way.

Dyer predicted that within the next six months, urban coalitions growing out of a national "coalition" of mayors, business, labor, religious and civil rights leaders, which met in Washington next year, would convene in a number of Tennessee cities providing the "community commitment" Dyer feels is necessary to solve urban problems.

The council will elect 1968 officers this morning. Ten Tennessee councils are represented.

(140) Tennessee

Negroes Open Message

Following is the text of the statement Friday by 71 Negroes representing about 50 organizations:

"This is an open message to all citizens of Chattanooga:

"We do not condone violence in any form as a means of obtaining equal or civil rights.

"At this time in history when the entire nation mourns the death of the foremost exponent of Christian nonviolence, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the Negro community wishes to re-emphasize certain inalienable truths: Martin Luther King addressed himself to the unfinished promises of democracy. He challenged the lofty promises we make and the methods we practice in America.

"He sought within the framework of law to save the soul of America. Whenever he disobeyed a law because of Christian conscience, he took the consequences of that civil disobedience. He never ran away, as the man who dastardly shot him down in the dead of night and ran as a coward. We say strongly that Christian nonviolence as espoused by Martin Luther King is the only alternative to violence.

"While the Negro community deplores acts of violence, as also deplore indifference and inaction on the part of the white community to move in the direction of action programs that work on the causes of riots and disorder.

"The Community recognizes that communication between the races here in Chattanooga far surpasses the system of communication in the major portion of the cities across the nation. This is exemplified in the fact that the past few days have not resulted in a major crisis.

"The committee also recognizes that the many established agencies who recognize and practice communication between their agency and the Negro community must also seek to communicate the fact to the white community. The committee recognizes the dilemma of the agency in this position and commends them for taking this stand.

"The committee recognizes that as long as the liaison agency is necessary to be the spokesman of communication between the two races, Chattanooga will remain two separate and distinct groups of people composing a single community.

"If together we are to build Chattanooga into a great city, we must have people-to-people communication along with agency-people communication.

ACTION PROGRAMS ARE PROPOSED

"We recommend these specific action programs:

1. We commend the City Commission for its foresightedness and concern in passing the Open City ordinance prior to the 1964 Civil Rights Act; we now deem it necessary that the City Commission pass an ordinance supplementing the Civil Rights Act to cover all establishments serving the public and requiring license by the city. These establishments remain a potential powder keg from whence violence may and can erupt. Most Chattanoogans feel that equal access to establishments are open or should be open to all Chattanoogans.

"2. We urge the various plants and business firms to come under the Equal Opportunity Employment Act and to recruit Negroes for their employment. This, too, is a powder keg that could erupt into violence.

"3. There are unwritten employment practices even within so-called equal opportunity employment firms and plants that actually and actively discriminate against Negroes in employment. We recommend programs that provide training opportunities for the hard-core unemployed who have unemployable attitudes, for the purpose of redirecting their attitudes with the end product being employment. We chide the white business community for not having developed this type of training program in the past. The very mature of our segregated society has prevented the realization of the fullest potential and development, particularly of our Negro citizens. This is also a potential powder keg. Our Chattanooga community needs to be reconstructed so that the youth of today will not fall prey to the same heritage.

"4. The most appalling mental health problem facing this nation is racism. It undermines our very social structure, our business world, our employment practices, particularly in the devious ways in which the quota system, the track system, the test system, the so-called qualification system, the seniority system, and the apprenticeship programs of the unions discriminate. This again is a potential powder keg from whence violence may erupt.

NEGRO EDUCATION IS 'IN A VACUUM'

"5. Too long the community has set Negro education, particularly Negro schools, aside in a vacuum. Not enough attention has been given to the structure and the curriculum within the schools. Too frequently we have been given second-class and old school buildings and equipment in which to operate an efficient education program. Even in the pattern of integration of teachers, the community has allowed the better qualified Negro teachers to be transferred to the white schools without replacing them with better qualified white teachers for the Negro schools. This is colonialism at its worst. And again, this is a potential powder keg from whence violence may erupt.

6. Our city school system has ignored the fact that Negroes have made significant and worthwhile contributions to America and to the world. We urge that this omission should be corrected in order that respect, decency, and correct attitudes concerning the Negro might be instilled in the minds of all students, both Negro and white. A single history book that presents the true story in American progress which includes the achievements and contributions of all races regardless of race, creed or color is imperative at this crucial time in history. The failure to have respect and understanding of the various contributions of all races is and will continue to be a potential powder keg from whence violence may erupt, because youth depends largely upon its relationship to a heritage upon which to build feelings and attitudes of significance in a society among men.

"7. Since the news media is the most potent instrument in moulding public opinion, it is essential that Negroes be represented on the staffs of all news media in order to relate and project the true image of the Negro. Every day the community is subjected to inflammatory baiting news reports in newspapers, radio, and television which portrays the Negro in a negative image.

"8. Somehow, within the teaching of religion, the churches and synagoues should assume their creative and dynamic role of leadership for human dignity and brotherhood and quit loafing.

"9. Finally, we recognize the fact that the so-called Negro community has not in the past taken too deep an interest in the needs, aspirations and frustrations of the vast segment of underprivileged people of all races. We hereby pledge to work for a spirit of oneness promoted through considering all citizens of the United States and Chattanooga as Americans—not blacks and whites, which tends to be a divisive influence, and give our support with all men of good will who will seek these and other such mandates to make Chattanooga a truly All-America City. We strongly urge the City Commission to establish by ordinance a Human Relations Commission with a staff to work on these kinds of problems on a continuing basis.

Racism is a factor which breeds only mistrust, hate and fear. Many have the idea that this racism affects only the inner city, but this fear, mistrust and hate becomes a part of each home, no matter how far removed it is from the inner city. If Chattanooga is to grow as an All-America city, racism is a luxury far too expensive for us to enjoy.

THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES, SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1968.

TEXAS

Point of View

Intergroup Relations

By Dr. Joe Witherspoon
Professor of Law
(First in a Series)

The problem of intergroup relations is, by any measure, the greatest domestic problem of the United States.

The population of this country consists of people of many different races, colors, religions, ancestries and national origins as well as of different sexes, age groups, and economic brackets.

Achieve man's goals

It is essential to the public health, safety, welfare, peace, and progress of this nation and of each state and community that this diversity serve to strengthen individual and collective efforts to achieve man's enduring goals and not be used to weaken these efforts.

The latter result occurs when members of one group practice, through private or governmental institutions, discrimination and other harmful activity against members of another group in any phase of community life merely on account of their race, color, religion, ancestry, national origin, sex, age, economic status, or other normal group characteristic.

Witherspoon

Practices of this kind and the conditions accompanying them undermine the freedom and justice essential to a genuine democracy.

Relations between the Negro ethnic group and the white majority group constitute one example of the extraordinarily serious problem of intergroup relations at large in this country. The relations between these two groups have steadily worsened during the past quarter century. Despite a number of substantial gains, including several in the legal order, that have been made by Negroes, they have not substantially changed the lot of the average Negro in American society that generally obtained a quarter of a century ago.

Segregation remains

It still remains true throughout the nation, and more especially in the South and Southwest, that most Negroes can live only in certain residential areas segregated from the rest of the community; most Negro children can attend only poorer, de facto segregated schools; most Negro professional and business men can operate only in Negro business districts and serve Negro clients; most Negro workers can work only in the lower-paid, lower skill jobs; and most Negro families can earn incomes amounting to only one-half of that earned by white families.

Negroes face widespread discrimination in government and private employment and in the operation of unions and employment agencies. They cannot obtain admission to professional and business organizations that are crucial to the progress of members of the professional and business fields affected.

They encounter discrimination in the purchase, rental, and financing of homes and commercial space. The public housing available to them has been principally located in urban ghettos and is constructed so as to put severe strains on family life. They can buy homes usually only on a conditional contract of sale which, in denying them the security enjoyed by most white home buyers, subjects them to the monthly possibility of losing, without recourse, an investment it has taken them years to make.

Urban renewal programs have removed them from valuable center city land and created new and even more congested urban segregated residential areas that will become in time like the ghettos their inhabitants had to leave.

The facts just reviewed are generally paraded in the better newspapers, magazines, journals, and government publications but they are still not understood by most white Americans.

These facts reflect the more basic fact that the white majority is utilizing the private and public institutions of our society — supposed to be open to all — with the effects of securing and increasing its exclusive hold on the good things of the free Democratic society.

Negroes are now in the process of a revolution designed to overturn the unjust effects of this white dominance. This revolution has been conducted, fortunately for us all, mainly in an orderly manner although it has erupted into occasional destructive violence in city after city, particularly during the summers of the past three years.

Costly violence

This violence, which has been dramatic and costly when it has occurred, has had two effects. In Watts, for example, it has stimulated a number of substantial efforts by the white majority to understand finally the causes of the bitter outbreak and to undertake some initial efforts to alleviate these causes. On the other hand, it has diverted the minds of too many Americans from the almost unimaginable human tragedy that permeates the daily lives of millions of America's Negroes.

The broken families; the rat-infested and tumbledown housing; the poor health; the malnutrition; the lack of adequate medical care and legal assistance, the lack of know-how to obtain needed welfare services and assistance from city hospitals and other governmental agencies; the lack of adequate recreational facilities; the lack of the city services and facilities that other portions of the city enjoy; the lack of educational facilities for adults who missed obtaining an adequate education during their youth due to no real fault of their own — these are but a few of the almost countless deficiencies in the life of American Negroes as compared with the life lived by most white Americans.

Problems for Negroes

What is true of the status of most of the 20 million Negroes in American life is largely true of most of the 6 million Latin-Americans of Mexican and Puerto Rican origin. The problems of Negroes have been fairly well discussed but the problems of Latin-Americans, particularly in our Southwest, are hardly known by the majority group referred to as the "Anglos".

As a group, Latin-Americans are far less well-educated than Negroes, they live in similar or even worse urban ghettos, their children also attend poorer, de facto segregated schools, and they are the target of discrimination in employment, governmental services, and often in housing as well.

(See INTERGROUP, page 3.)

("Point of View" does not necessarily represent Texan editorial policy. Contributions are welcome but must be typed on a 60-character line, triple-spaced. 90-95 lines only in order to fit in the space available.)

They also bear the wound of a long isolation from the American culture and language in part self-enforced but principally the product of the only way of life that has been opened to them in this country by its majority "Anglo" group.

After four years of intensive work on the Austin scene in the field of intergroup or human relations, an understanding of three things strikes me as central to any adequate beginning to meeting the problems just reviewed in Austin or in other communities of this state.

One is the fact that, by and large, the members of the majority group apparently do not really care about the welfare of their fellow citizens who are the Negroes, the Latin-Americans, and, more generally, the very poor.

Majority doesn't care

If members of the majority group really cared about their welfare, they would take the time to find out about the manifold problem of these groups and begin to do something about them.

This lack of genuine concern stems in large part from a defect in group and individual character of the profoundest sort and from a lack of knowledge and genuine personal contact with the Negro, the Latin-American, and the very poor.

No particular element of the majority group is exempt from this characterization. It is a sad but clear and brutal fact.

A second major thing that must be understood if our Texas communities are to begin to make an adequate beginning in resolving human relations problems is the almost total lack of leadership at either the state or local level within either the majority or minority groups with regard to dealing with human relations problems.

No established minority group organization in Austin or elsewhere in the state has achieved more than ad hoc effectiveness in seeking to remedy human relations problems. The regular, well-established majority group organizations — whether in the private or public sector — have largely ignored human relations problems.

A third major consideration to be understood before we can make an adequate beginning to resolving human relations in Austin and elsewhere in the state is that each community, by and large, has the resources, both human and material, to begin to deal in significant ways with the discrimination and disadvantages thrown in the way of our minority groups and our poor.

These resources are, in the aggregate, far more plentiful than anything the federal government has thrown into its efforts so far to secure a rectification in human relations in this country.

Intergroup Relations...

(Continued from page 2.)

The discrimination and disadvantaging that so seriously impair the opportunities of our minority groups occur largely at the local level and must be dealt with ultimately at the local level whatever official or private efforts are mustered for this purpose.

Central problem

The central problem in regard to intergroup relations is how to organize and to utilize the resources of each state and community for the purpose of effectively securing an improvement in human relations.

The experience of a few cities and states during the past 20 years is very instructive in this regard. Although some 30 states and 25 communities have adopted a new comprehensive form of civil rights law and a new form of governmental agency — called a human relations commission — to administer it, only a very few of these have gained some measurable degree of success.

We would all do well to study the experience of cities like Philadelphia and Pittsburgh and of states like Pennsylvania and New York. I have spent the past four years studying this experience. A book summarizing my studies and recommendations will be published by the University of Texas Press. It is entitled: "Administrative Implementation of Civil Rights."

Intergroup problems

There are more than 2,000 local communities along with the 50 states in the nation in which we can say that very serious intergroup problems exist involving minority groups such as Negroes and Latin-Americans.

The central task that must be performed in each of these communities and states i the reconstruction of human relations within them where most of the causes, conditions accompanying, and results flowing from discrimination and other harmful activity directed against minority and other disadvantaged groups are occurring. This reconstruction must be directed so as to eliminate the causes of this harmful activity, ameliorate the conditions flowing from it, and to overcome the results and scars that have been inflicted upon the community and its disadvantaged groups.

With regard to the majority group, performance of this task means the reorganization and reformation of majority group actions, habits, customs, and private and official arrangements that have produced and continue to maintain the conditions so seriously affecting the opportunities of minority and other disadvantaged groups in the community.

With regard to the minority and other disadvantaged groups performance of these tasks requires the development of leaders within these groups who will concentrate upon matters of human rights and relations, the provision of various kinds of assistance to these groups and leaders in preparing for and obtaining various needed opportunities, and the protection of these groups against certain typical types of exploitation and abuse.

This central task of reconstruction of intergroup relations calls for the assembly and redirection of the maximum human and material resources with each community. It demands that each community acknowledge the performance of this task to be its own responsibility and that each of its groups become genuinely involved in discharging it.

Necessary institution

The necessary institution for guiding the performance of this task and providing the appropriate leadership is an official human relations commission whose members are drawn in a truly representative fashion from the citizens of the community.

Three kinds of functions must be assigned the commission:

- The processing of individual complaints relative to all forms of harmful discrimination through investigation, conciliation, hearing, issuance of cease and desist orders, and judicial enforcement actions where necessary.
- The negotiation from a position of strength with wide sectors of businesses, union organizations, professions, government agencies, and private organizations for the taking of action by them to improve opportunities available to minority and other disadvantaged groups.
- The undertaking of various forms of official constructive action designed to create the attitudes, conditions, and actions essential in each community for moving its majority and minority groups to confront and to resolve all of its serious problems of intergroup relations.

No other organization in the community can muster the authority and acceptance that an official human relations commission can in dealing with human relations matters. By far, the "negotiation" and "constructive action" functions of an official human relations commission have proved to be more effective in achieving the central task previously described.

Process complaints

The processing of individual complaints contributes far less in producing positive changes. Suffice it to say here that no community and no state can hope to make adequate progress in resolving intergroup relations problems until it has established an official human relations commission, enacted a comprehensive civil rights law prescribing all the various forms of harmful discrimination, and empowered its commission to perform all three functions previously outlined.

Naturally, it must also provide an adequate staff and budget for its commission.

Just as important as an official human relations commission for each state and each community is the work of private organizations in the human relations field.

Right action

It usually takes a number of years for a community or a state to become wise enough to establish the right kind of human relations commission and the right kind of civil rights law. Moreover, even if these are established, the commission cannot do the task itself.

It must largely proceed by engendering the performance of the right kind of actions on the part of every element of the community. Long before a strong human relations commission and civil rights law become a reality for a community or a state private efforts must be made by all forms of private and official organizations to hasten the day of better human relations.

Some way must be found to persuade the university faculties and administrations that they really are equally responsible with the rest of the citizenry for the degradation which has been forced by the majority group upon Negroes, Latin-Americans, the poor generally, and many other groups in our local, state, and national communities.

They must be made to see their special responsibility to take the numerous unique positive steps that can only be performed by universities in starting the process of necessary change in group habits, actions, practices, and arrangements that harm our minority groups.

Exercise leadership

Someway must be found to move the ministers and lay leaders of Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Jewish churches to begin to exercise their leadership so as to move their congregations and fellows to begin to give practical meaning to their doctrines of love of neighbor or at least of justice toward him relative to the human misery about them.

Some way must be found to impress business and professional men and government officials with the inevitability of soon securing substantial readjustment in the present status of intergroup relations between the majority group, on the one hand, and Negroes, Latin-Americans, the poor, and many other disadvantaged groups, on the other.

Some way must be found to interest the younger people in our communities to begin the fascinating work their parents have failed to perform in ameliorating human relations problems.

Point of View

Austin Rights Needs

By Dr. Joe Witherspoon
Professor of Law
(Second of Two Columns)

A part of my work during the past four years has involved an effort in conjunction with many others to develop a viable private organization that could begin the process of change in the Austin community.

The hope was that on the basis of experimentation here a model for successful community work could be developed that would be useful not only here but elsewhere in the state and region.

It was organized as a Texas non-profit, charitable corporation and is called the "Citywide Committee of Individuals and Organizations for Human Rights." It has a board of directors and a membership of around 200 persons.

Its purposes include working for the establishment of an official human relations commission and a comprehensive civil rights law in the City of Austin.

Dr. Witherspoon

It actually drafted and presented to the City Council on May 5, 1966, a careful proposal for accomplishing this purpose. The organization describes itself as being founded "to promote equality of opportunity for all persons in Austin through active cooperation between Negro, Latin, and Anglo citizens, their churches, and other organizations."

Education Program

It has an educational program. One part of this program involves tutoring Negroes and Latin-Americans for obtaining a high school diploma equivalent. Approximately 70 persons are students in this program.

Already two of the students tutored have obtained their high school diploma equivalents since the program started last September.

Another part of the educational program is a typing and business English class. Approximately 36 Negroes and Latin-Americans are attending classes at St. Mary's Academy.

Some of the graduates of these classes have already obtained excellent jobs or have been able to qualify for on-the-job training at one of our large federal agencies.

The tutoring takes place at the CCIOHR Human Rights Center, 1106-B Concho Street, five days a week in the afternoon.

Another facet of the CCIOHR program involves helping members of minority groups with various kinds of problems they are encountering in dealing with government or business.

A law fraternity has supplied several teams of what amounts to "case-workers." They and some young lawyers still associated with the University School of Law have provided assistance in helping people to obtain clinic cards for medical services; in resolving difficulties between a family and school authorities; in obtaining needed clothing, food, and money; in obtaining loans of money to save a home; and in numerous other ways.

A third facet of the CCIOHR program is its series of public forums. These are held usually in a church in East or South Austin in order to reach the maximum number of persons in those areas.

In them are discussed problems of importance to members of minority groups with a view to providing them with a basis for making up their own minds with the best guidance obtainable on these problems.

It is hoped that the involvement of CCIOHR in such activities will move other groups to take up the good work, and that each organization will establish a human relations committee and undertake one or more significant projects for the improvement of intergroup relations in this city.

Work such as CCIOHR is doing will add a new meaning to any person's life. The member of the majority group who participates forms many new friends and truly learns, as well as a member of the majority group can learn, what it means to be a Negro or a Latin-American or a very poor person.

He or she begins to see the extraordinary possibilities in each Texas community for effectuating the first real change that is likely to be made in human relations in this state. He sees that what the federal government is currently doing is very far removed, indeed, from what must be done if we would make some real progress in human relations.

In working with organizations like CCIOHR, one also senses how close our communities in Texas are to the kind of acts of frustration and violence that have marred the scene of so many northern cities and more recently southern cities as well.

An organization like CCIOHR can build up a treasury of acceptance in the minority group communities that can help to avoid such outbreaks as these and to cut down the extent of violence when it does occur.

Efforts such as these cannot begin soon enough. The counsel of responsible Negro citizens is that some substantial readjustment in human relations must be made soon or what has occurred almost everywhere else in the ration will reach our own Texas cities.

Desperate Need

Austin and other Texas communities desperately need to establish official human relations commissions, to enact comprehensive human relations ordinances, and to provide commission members and staff personnel as well as adequate budgets.

It is once more time to begin in Austin a far more comprehensive effort than the ones organized in 1963-64 and 1965-66 by CCIOHR to move citizenry and its political leadership to establish such an official human relations commission.

It is important for each organization in Austin that counts itself genuinely interested in the welfare and progress of this city to undertake substantial activities to make such a commission a reality.

Unless these efforts are undertaken and unless supporting private efforts in bettering human relations are also performed by these organizations, it will continue to be truly said of our city and its residents that they really do not care about the welfare of Negroes, Latin-Americans, and our poor generally.

("Point of View" does not necessarily represent Texan editorial policy. Contributions are welcome but must be typed on a 60-character line, triple-spaced, 90-95 lines only in order to fit in the space available.)

E NEW YORK TIMES, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1967

TEXAS

Students Protest Banning Campus Rights Group

400 at Texas Southern U. Demonstrate as Friends of S.N.C.C. Is Barred

Special to The New York Times

HOUSTON, March 28—About 400 students blocked doors and disrupted classes today at Texas Southern University here to protest the school administration's refusal to recognize Friends of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee as an on-campus organization.

Texas Southern has about 4,000 students, most of whom are Negroes.

The student strike also protested the discharge of Mack Jones, faculty sponsor of the organization.

Dr. James B. Jones, dean of students, said that the group had failed to show an established relationship with the Atlanta-based student committee.

Dr. Jones delivered a letter, in which he said he regretted being unable to grant approval to the group as an on-campus organization, to the Rev. R. D. Kirkpatrick, a graduate student and campus chairman of the committee.

Mr. Kirkpatrick read the letter to about 400 students. The letter was then burned while the crowd chanted, "Close it (the school) down."

The students blocked doors to university buildings, threatened to lock nonparticipants in classrooms, and tried to stop traffic on a street that runs through the campus.

Mr. Kirkpatrick said the protest would continue until a meeting was held with school officials.

The campus group was told on March 20 that it must meet off campus and that the contract of the organization's faculty sponsor would not be renewed.

University officials never revealed their reason for not renewing the contract of Mr. Jones, the group's faculty sponsor.

He is a Woodrow Wilson fellow and a candidate for a Doctor of Philosophy degree at the University of Illinois.

His one-year contract as instructor in the government department at Texas Southern expires this summer.

HOUSTON

Dow Jones Off 9.7, Falls Below 900

See Story Column 1

HOUSTON CHRONICLE

Houston's Family Newspaper

Vol. 66 No. 208 TUESDAY, MAY 9, 1967 HOUSTON, TEXAS 77001 Second Class Postage Paid at Houston, Texas 10 CENTS

COMPLETE CLOSING QUOTATIONS MARKETS

Cleanup of Houston Slums Urged

Westec Ex-Chairman Refuses to Take Oath

Major Attack Urged On 'Costly' Slums

FROM PAGE 1

of the cost of a program to rebuild a large slum neighborhood, rehabilitate its residents and otherwise improve their living conditions.

The committee also recommended that Houston study the state housing finance agencies in Massachusetts and New York with a view of the Texas Legislature being asked to create such an agency.

Private Innovations

Such agencies, organized as public benefit corporations, finance and seek construction of low—and middle—income housing at no cost to the taxpayer.

The committee also suggested several private innovations:

- Bond sales to finance rehabilitation of neighborhoods.
- Organization of tenants, and the pooling of their skills, to renovate dilapidated neighborhoods.
- Solicitation of contributions from individuals and corporations.

Among other recommendations of the committee were:

- A neighborhood development corporation, getting operating expenses from federal programs, to provide financing, technical assistance, coordination and the development of industrial sites in slum areas.

Federal grants to finance the building of youth centers, playgrounds and other public facilities in low income areas.

- Privately sponsored housing projects that would qualify for federal rent supplements.

The committee supported the need of the Citizens Advisory Committee on Housing, recently formed by the city, and urged that the city complete as soon as possible its comprehensive community plan and neighborhood analyses in progress.

Dilapidated Homes

The committee estimated Houston has 50,000 dilapidated and deteriorating homes, mainly in the old third, fourth and fifth wards. The families living in these homes pay $10 to $15 weekly rent, which is all they can afford, it said.

Figures were cited that disease, crime, property destruction and the costs to all taxpayers are much higher for slums than in other areas of a city.

"It should be apparent that life in the world of poverty is not cheap for anyone," the committee reported.

Public Housing Asked

Claiming that slums are too costly not to abolish, the housing committee of the Houston Council on Human Relations today recommended a broad-based attack on the problem.

The committee urged the city to adopt a housing code and study the possibility of zoning.

The council announced the formation of a non-profit foundation to sponsor housing for low-income families.

The first job of the foundation will be to plan and build a low-income housing development. Dr. Stewart Wilbur, council president, said the council was hoping the development could be as large as 200 units.

Revenue Bonds

The committee recommended that revenue bonds be sold to finance "a modest number" of new public housing units when the city meets the requirements for federal aid. The requirements include some form of zoning.

It noted that Houston's existing 2340 units, built when the city did qualify for federal aid, is in number far below other cities, including San Antonio's 5554, Dallas' 6372, New Orleans' 12,270 and Atlanta's 10,014.

The committee supported the federal leasing program for which the city does qualify and under which the City Council already has authorized the Houston Housing Authority to lease 500 units.

The committee also recommended that Houston become a "model city" under the 1966 Demonstration Cities Act.

Under the act the federal government will pay 80 percent agency U.S.D.A.

(See MAJOR, Page 11)

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
CONSUMER AND MARKETING SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20250

JUL 1967

Mr. J. Edwin Stanfield
Director, Field Activities
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Stanfield:

This is in reply to your recent letter concerning the Food Stamp Program in Mississippi.

We would like to assure you that we are taking all possible action to insure that Federal food assistance is available to the needy in Mississippi. With the cooperation of State and local officials, Federal food assistance programs are now operating in every county in Mississippi--one of only six States in the country where this is true. These programs are now providing food assistance to about 400,000 people in Mississippi. That number represents about 20 percent of the total State population.

While that progress was good, we were aware that more needed to be done. We, therefore, visited several hundred families in Mississippi to learn, at first hand, about their food needs and consumption. As a result, we have announced several modifications in our Federal food programs.

We are enclosing a copy of the testimony of Secretary Freeman, before a Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. This testimony outlines in detail the Federal food programs and the program modifications we are making. As Secretary Freeman indicated, we believe these program modifications will insure that food is available to every citizen of Mississippi who needs this assistance.

Sincerely yours,

James E. Springfield

Deputy Director
Food Stamp Division

Enclosure

For P.M. Release

Testimony of the Honorable Secretary of Agriculture
Orville L. Freeman
Before the Sub-committee on Employment and Manpower of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare
Tuesday, July 11, 1967 - 2:00 p.m.

Mr. Chairman, members of the sub-committee:

I welcome this opportunity to appear before you.

The United States today possesses all the physical resources necessary to insure that every person has the opportunity for a full and nutritious diet. We have the food, and we have the most efficient system in the world to distribute it. All that is necessary is to use these resources efficiently and humanely.

I am confident that a series of proposals, the product of experience and experimentation to expand the USDA's food assistance program, which are now being put into effect in Mississippi will insure that by the end of 1967 an expanded and improved diet will be available to every citizen of that State who requires this assistance.

I want to emphasize, however, that to complete the task of reaching every person in this country today with a full and nutritious diet, we must know more than the fact there are still hungry people. We must thoroughly understand the tools we have -- the resources, organization and techniques -- and the nature of the difficulties we must overcome to complete the job.

Let me outline those tools and some of those difficulties.

The Department of Agriculture operates two programs designed to provide low-income families with more food than they can get with their own resources. One is a program to distribute food commodities directly, and the other is a Food Stamp Program which enables low-income households to buy more food purchasing power with the money normally spent for food.

The Direct Distribution Program began in the early 1930's as a way to share with low-income families the food commodities which the Federal government acquires under surplus removal and price support programs. The USDA makes these food commodities available to the States, and the States in turn distribute the food to county and city governments. Those who participate in the program are certified as eligible by local welfare agencies, and receive the food commodities at distribution centers provided by local officials.

The Direct Distribution Program as we know it really started in 1954 when the USDA began to pay the cost of shipping the food, a cost paid until then by the States. The program grew from 155 counties in 1954 to over 1,300 in 1959.

In 1960 the Federal food program became a campaign issue. The program was nearly moribund. Only five commodities -- lard, flour, dry milk, corn meal, and rice -- were being distributed with a total value of less than $1.20 per month, per person.

The cost of distributing these foods in many areas was greater than the value of the food. As a result many States and local governments had refused to enter the program and nearly 200 counties had dropped out from the 1959 peak.

In January, 1961, the new administration doubled the number of food commodities. Later it was increased to 15. The value of products currently being provided is about $5.55 per person per month, and will increase another $1.50 this month when we begin distributing butter and cheese. The number of counties participating has increased sharply and today -- including those in the food stamp program -- nearly 2,200 provide a food assistance program for low income families.

More than 3,400,000 persons in nearly 1,400 counties are now participating in the direct distribution program, and can obtain from it over half of the daily caloric intake recommended for an adequate diet. The current mix of commodities now available will provide on a daily basis -- if used -- almost 90 percent of the protein, more than 60 percent of the iron, more than enough calcium, thiamine and riboflavin. Very little vitamin A and ascorbic acid are available as these nutrients are found primarily in fresh fruits and vegetables which cannot be easily handled in this kind of program.

We have long recognized the weaknesses of the direct distribution program. Even as we have improved it, we knew it would never be adequate. While 15 commodities provide more variety than 5, it is difficult for even a highly skilled cook to prepare from 15 commodities the variety of dishes which the average housewife can make from the thousands of food products in today's grocery store. It can be done, but it is not easy.

It is a difficult program to administer, particularly in the sense that it requires us to duplicate the highly developed commercial distribution system.

These and other factors led us in early 1961 to launch by Executive Order the Food Stamp Program as a pilot effort to test whether we could improve the level of food assistance to the poor. It is a distant cousin to the stamp program of pre-World War II days -- a program that died because it ceased to be a food program.

After three years of operation on a pilot basis, President Johnson recommended and the Congress passed the Food Stamp Act in 1964. The purpose was, and is, to help low-income families supplement their food dollars with enough additional food purchasing power to obtain a better diet.

The Congress assigned to the States and local welfare agencies the task of certifying those who are eligible. States are also responsible under the Act for the sale and the security of the food coupons.

The USDA is responsible for authorizing eligible grocery stores where food stamp users can spend the stamps exactly as though they were spending cash. The Federal Treasury redeems the stamps through the commercial banking system.

The Food Stamp Program began with eight pilot projects and an expenditure of a little over $14 million the first year. It has grown in the fiscal year just ended to cover more than 800 counties and cities. Over 1.7 million people are participating, and the President's budget asks $195 million for fiscal 1968.

Both the food stamp and direct distribution programs today are supplementing the diets of over five million people. Better than two out of every three counties in the U. S. have one or the other family food assistance program.

Thus, the concept of providing food assistance for low-income families has evolved in three decades from a means of distributing surplus food to a system of increasing the food buying power of low-income families so they can obtain a nutritious diet through the same efficient food distribution system available to all families.

I hardly need recount for you the progress of these programs. The continuing support which is vital to them has not been easy to build or hold. Four votes could have defeated the Food Stamp Act of 1964, and eleven votes could have seriously crippled the program last month when it was considered for extension in the House. We have been successful thus far in obtaining adequate financial support for both programs, but this effort must always be done in competition with all the other programs and needs which the Congress must finance.

However, establishing the programs, and securing the continuing support for them is only the first step toward completing the task of assuring a full and nutritious diet for every person.

Once the programs are available, the second step is to insure they are operated and administered efficiently and effectively, not only at the national level but in the states and counties where they reach the low income family.

And after the first and second steps, we must insure that the participating family is doing an effective job in planning meals and preparing the food required for an adequate diet.

Thus, while we have been able to increase by over 1,000 the number of counties which provide a food assistance program, there are still about 800 where no program is available. Obviously, we are not reaching all the people who are hungry.

Only six States, one of which is Mississippi, now provide complete coverage of all counties with the food assistance programs. There are eight counties in New York which lack these programs, and we estimate nearly 35,000 people could benefit. San Diego, in San Diego County, California, is one of the two major cities in the U.S. which does not participate in or plan to join these programs. We estimated that nearly 75,000 people in San Diego would be eligible for this assistance. My own home county of Hennepin in Minnesota does not participate in these programs, although the city of Minneapolis has a food stamp program. In the Southeast, only 11 counties out of 46 in South Carolina have a food assistance program. In Alabama, only about half the counties provide food assistance. In Virginia, only 6 out of 96 counties make food assistance available.

We have been able to secure food assistance programs in all but 15 of the 100 lowest per capita income counties. However, among the lowest third per capita income counties and those considered to be poverty stricken by the Office of Economic Opportunity, there are 331 counties without these food assistance programs. I am submitting a list of these counties for the record.

In the past two years we have worked closely with OEO on these programs. That agency has underwritten the cost of administration and distribution of food commodities in counties where local tax resources are inadequate. In Mississippi today, through Operation HELP, OEO is financing some or all the administrative costs of direct distribution in 41 counties. Similar arrangements have been made in 61 counties in other States.

OEO recently has indicated that it must discontinue its financial assistance for these programs by the end of this year. In order to assure that the food assistance programs continue in these counties, and that we reach needy families in the 331 low-income counties where no program is available, the USDA is prepared to provide the financial aid these counties will need to distribute food commodities to low-income families.

At the same time, I have directed the USDA's Technical Action Panel in the States and counties to work with state and local officials to urge and assist those counties which are not participating to set up a food assistance program as quickly as possible. The TAP group is a new instrument we have created in the USDA. It consists of the heads of the USDA agencies in each State, and its job is to make sure that the programs of the Federal government are effectively "reaching out" to the people who need them in rural America.

We estimate this effort to expand the coverage of the direct distribution program, combined with the growth of the Food Stamp Program planned for this fiscal year, will bring the opportunity for an improved diet to nearly a million more people.

However, we know that making food assistance available does not automatically insure that food reaches the people who need it. This is particularly true of our experiences with the Food Stamp Program.

The low-income household has to be encouraged to join the program, and special help must be provided to many families if they are to use the increased supply of food effectively.

The problems involved in these steps of implementation are complex. They make the task of starting a food stamp program seem simple in comparison.

I can illustrate this best with the results of a detailed study of the Food Stamp Program in Washington county, Mississippi. This is a county in the Mississippi delta which has an average per capita income of $1,094 and where nearly 3 out of 10 families have incomes too low to provide adequate food.

We wanted to know who was participating in the program, and who was not; and why. We wanted to know if the program was constructed so that it excluded some households, or if there were other reasons which made it difficult to reach hungry people.

The results of this survey, a copy of which I submit for the record, reveal a situation and a set of conditions which has been all but hidden from the eye.

Everyone has come to assume that the families who are not receiving the food assistance they need were those with many children who lived in rural areas away from town, who did not receive public assistance and who had no income.

The survey did identify some households like this, but it found another and much larger group which the Food Stamp Program was not reaching.

Over half the families which are eligible are not participating. They generally live in towns; they are, by and large, urban families. They are likely to be receiving welfare payments, and the size of the household is either small -- from one to three, or very large with incomes near the upper limits of program eligibility.

Nearly seven out of ten of the eligible urban households are not participating.

The households participating in the program generally are rural families of large size. They do not receive public assistance as a rule and have incomes ranging from only a few dollars to more than $200 a month.

Nearly seven out of ten of the rural households eligible for food stamps are participating in the program.

When families were asked why they did not participate, most said that the stamps cost too much or that they did not have enough money.

However, we found that nine out of ten of these families actually spent more money -- in some cases, substantially more -- than they would have had to pay for stamps.

Both statements are consistent and can be understood in relation to the way low-income families earn money and buy food. Money is earned in small amounts and food is purchased mostly as it is needed. Thus, while the cost of a particular food item is always known, families generally are unaware of how much they spend over a month for food.

Thus, the real task we face in getting more people to participate in the Food Stamp Program is to show the low-income family that food stamps will help them buy more food ... and more of the items they need for the family.

We cannot do this by sending them a postcard, or by making speeches, or by getting newspapers to print the story. The only effective way is to work directly and personally with low-income families to explain the program and to show them how they can benefit directly from it.

As a result of this study and other surveys we have made, I have made a number of changes in the Food Stamp Program which are now or shortly will be in effect in Mississippi -- and which will be extended to other States as rapidly as possible.

First, recognizing that families with no visible income, or at best intermittent employment, find it hard to pay even $2.00 a month per person, I am reducing the purchase requirement for the lowest income category to 50 cents a person per month. This is now in effect in Mississippi. It means that a family of six or more which has been paying $12 a month to get $72 or more in stamps, now will pay only $3 to receive the same amount.

The payment rate for the next two lowest levels also is being adjusted downward, and we are studying additional changes as well. Further, I have asked the States to assure me that where even this minimum payment would prevent a family from participating, the local county government will take steps to meet this cost. In most areas of the country where there is no regular general assistance program, the county now arranges to cover that portion of the purchase price for the very low-income families. If the counties are unwilling to do this, then we will find another means to qualify these people.

Second, in view of the difficulty a family has in putting together enough cash to enter the program and pay its back bills at the same time, I am reducing the purchase price by half for the first month for all new participants.

This will enable them to get a head start on old bills, and, once in the program, they will be able to better meet other obligations.

Third, we will begin to hire people in Mississippi this month who live in the neighborhoods where low-income families reside to serve as Food Stamp Aides. They will be a communications link between the poor and those who operate the program at local, State and Federal levels. The program aide will explain the program to those who are not participating, assist them to become eligible and help them to begin using food stamps.

After the initial phase, the program aides will continue to work with the food stamp families to teach them to prepare nutritious meals and provide training in food buying and other household skills.

The program aides also will help resolve complaints and misunderstandings about the program as they arise, and alert the program staff to errors in certification and to any problems encountered at grocery stores in the program.

Until the program aides are operating in full force, we are developing a special outreach effort through the State TAP to contact and encourage all eligible households in the food stamp counties to join the program if they are not already participating. In addition, the State extension service is designating a liaison person in each county to work with State welfare personnel and the food stamp staffs to develop an educational program to reach eligible families.

We also are asking OEO to make the resources of its Community Action Program in these counties available for an outreach program on an individual family basis.

Fourth, we will enlarge the number of USDA food stamp offices from five to ten in Mississippi to provide more intensive supervision to the effort to bring more low income families into the program.

Fifth, we are working with the States and counties to simplify the certification procedures, especially to reduce the time involved in waiting at the welfare office and eliminate many return visits.

Sixth, we are going to make additional studies similar to the Mississippi survey in other areas to determine if further adjustments should be made in the program, either on a regional or national basis.

I believe these changes and modifications represent the kind of experimentation which must go into any project which has so massive and difficult an objective as insuring that every person has the opportunity for a full and nutritious diet.

I also want to make it clear there will be further adjustments and changes in these programs as there must be in any programs that are so directly involved with the day-to-day lives of people who need help. We are, for example, studying the impact of the new minimum wage law on Southern field workers. We know this action is changing the work periods and seasonal income patterns, and we will have to determine what changes need to be made in our seasonal certification requirements.

In addition, we need to develop a special program in cooperation with health authorities for those families where dietary deficiencies are causing serious health problems. But we first must identify those families, and then we must know what those health problems are, and what kind of a diet is required to treat them.

But we have the programs .... and we have built the staff (some 900 USDA employees now work in the food stamp program) necessary to carry them out. We have developed the techniques to bring food assistance to those in need .... and to reach the low income family to help them make the best use of this food.

We have launched the big drive to complete the task of making our food abundance fully and effectively available to all persons.

However, I am not so naive as to believe the USDA can do this alone. We will need and appreciate the help of this committee and the Congress to encourage additional counties to utilize the food assistance programs. We need the help of all groups concerned about and working with low income families to encourage those who could benefit from the programs to participate in them.

With this kind of help, we can do the job. Without it, we cannot complete the task efficiently and quickly.

- - - -

USDA

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20250

August 2, 1967

Dear Friend:

Each year the goal of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS), an agency of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, has been to ensure that every eligible farm voter, whether white or non-white, has free and equal opportunity to cast a ballot for the candidates of his or her choice in local community ASCS elections.

This year, as in previous years, changes in election procedures have been made in an attempt to guarantee democratic ASCS elections. Because these changes are of the utmost importance to you and your organization, we want to inform you of them before the 1967 elections get underway. Incidentally, elections will be held simultaneously in all counties nationally this year during the third week of September (18-22).

Enclosed for your information is a brochure, "Vote for Farmers of Your Choice." I hope you will disseminate its information widely. Additional copies of the brochure are available on request.

We pledge ourselves to increased efforts in this area of procedural changes to secure and maintain the right of all farmers to participate fully and freely in elections. Should you require additional information, contact your local ASCS County Office Manager.

Your comments on these actions are invited.

Sincerely yours,

Wm M Seabron

William M. Seabron
Assistant to the Secretary

Enclosure

USDA

VOTE FOR FARMERS OF YOUR CHOICE

Election: 3rd Week of September

Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service
U. S. Department of Agriculture

VOTING FOR FARMERS OF YOUR CHOICE IS DEMOCRAC

MAIL-BALLOT ELECTION OF ASC COMMUNITY COMMITTEEMEN

This leaflet explains briefly the annual election by mail ballot of farmers as community committeemen to help the county committeemen run Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) farm programs locally.

These programs help assure a fair income for farmers by assisting them in keeping their production in line with market needs. As long as farmers can raise more than the market will take, such programs are needed to prevent ruinous price drops.

So, it is in your interest to elect good committeemen who will help make these programs successful.

YOUR VOTE

As a farmer you will want to vote for your Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation (ASC) community committeemen. Your community committeemen not only keep you informed about ASCS programs so that you may take part more fully in them, but they also elect your county committeemen.

And your county committeemen handle all ASCS programs locally. These include acreage allotments and price supports on cotton, tobacco, and peanuts and other crops; also cost-share conservation practices, such as digging ponds, building terraces, and planting trees and cover crops to keep your farm in good shape for your family and those who come afterward.

If you neglect to vote for your community committeemen, then you have no say as to who is chosen to help run these important programs.

A South Carolina ASC community committee in conference on acreage allotments with the county office manager.

WHO CAN VOTE?

Very likely you can vote for ASC community committeemen, if you are an owner, tenant, or sharecropper.

Both husband and wife can vote in community property States including Louisiana and Texas.

If you are under legal voting age, you can still vote in ASC elections if you run an entire farm. Those who run farms as legal guardians for minor children also can vote if the farm is eligible to take part in ASCS programs.

If you are not sure about your right to vote in ASC elections, ask about it at your ASCS county office.

WHO CAN RUN FOR COMMITTEEMAN?

Almost any farmer who is eligible to vote in ASC elections and who resides in the community is eligible to run for community committeeman.

If you wish to be a candidate, or if you have a neighbor that you would like to see nominated, and you have questions about eligibility, ask your ASCS county office for full information.

WHO CAN NOMINATE COMMITTEEMEN?

(1) You or any other farmer and 5 or more neighbors in the same community can nominate a fellow farmer for ASC community committeeman by signing a petition. And you may sign as many petitions as you wish, but only with farmers in your own community. Petitions must be in ASCS county office at least 25 days before the deadline for returning your ballot.

(2) Your community committee nominates 6 to 10 candidates.

(3) And your county committee may nominate the number of candidates needed to complete a list of 10, if your community committee nominates less than 10.

In communities having 10 percent or more eligible voters who are members of a minority group, the county committee must place a minority group member on the ballot unless 1 or more have been nominated either by the community committee or by petition. The addition must be made, even though it increases the number nominated by county and community committees to more than 10.

HOW MANY COMMITTEEMEN ARE ELECTED?

Three regular community committeemen and two alternates are elected each year.

The farmer receiving the highest number of votes becomes chairman of the committee; the one getting the next highest is vice chairman; and the third highest is the regular member. The next two highest vote getters are first and second alternate committeemen who serve in the absence of any of the three regular members.

CY IN ACTION

WHEN ARE ELECTIONS HELD?

ASC elections for community committeemen are set this year for the 3rd week of September in all counties throughout the United States. Announcement of the election will be sent by the ASC county committee to all known eligible ASC voters at least 35 days ahead of the election. Announcement will be made also in local newspapers, over radio, and in other ways.

COMMUNITY BOUNDARIES

So that you may be sure of the community in which you live and vote in ASC elections, your county committee will announce approved community boundaries at least 35 days before election. Map of community boundaries will be either mailed to each eligible voter, or posted in each community.

DON'T MISS OUT ON VOTING

If you believe you are eligible to vote in an ASC election, but do not receive information about the election and a ballot in the mail, ask about it right away at your ASCS county office.

Take along proof of your right to vote—the deed to your farm, or a written statement from your landlord if you are a tenant or a sharecropper, or any other proof you may have. But check at the ASCS office at once. Don't miss out on voting if you are eligible.

Arkansas ASC State, county and community committmen admire a ditch bank protected by grass against erosion.

If you are not satisfied after visiting your county office, contact your ASC State Committee, or a member of your ASC State Advisory Committee on Equal Opportunity. Their addresses are on the back page of this folder.

MARKING YOUR BALLOT

At least 10 days before the election, you should receive in the mail a ballot with the names of all candidates in your community listed in A, B, C, D-order. If the farmers of your choice for committeeman are not listed, write in their names on the blank lines at the bottom.

In addition to the ballot, there will be instructions on voting your ballot, and when to send the ballot back to your ASCS county office, and when and where votes will be counted.

Also there will be two envelopes. One will be plain. The other will be addressed to your ASCS county office, and will have a certification statement on the back like the example below.

The steps in voting are:

(1) Look over the list of nominees carefully.

(2) Vote for the farmers of your choice. Vote for 1, 2, 3, 4, or 5. BUT VOTE FOR NO MORE THAN 5. IF YOU VOTE FOR MORE THAN 5, YOUR VOTE WILL NOT BE COUNTED. This number may vary in 1-community counties.

(3) Fold your ballot and place it in the PLAIN envelope and seal it. DO NOT WRITE ON THE PLAIN ENVELOPE. Leaving it unmarked keeps your ballot secret.

(4) Put the PLAIN envelope with your ballot into the larger envelope already addressed to your ASCS county office and seal it also.

(5) After you have sealed the larger envelope, sign or mark "X" on the line to which the arrow points and date it. In this way you certify or swear that you voted your own ballot personally without undue influence of others.

A Mississippi ASC community committeeman, left, and one of his State committeemen inspect a new farm pond.

If you mark "X" it must be done in the presence of a witness who will complete the form as shown in the example below and sign it. If the outside envelope is not so marked and signed, your ballot WILL NOT BE COUNTED AS A VOTE. Mail your ballot right away; NO POSTAGE IS NEEDED.

COUNTING THE VOTES

When your ballot, like all the rest, gets back to your ASCS county office, it will be placed in the ballot box.

Within five days after the election, the votes will be counted publicly by your ASC county committee in a place open to all races. You may watch the counting if you wish.

Before the counting begins, the outside envelopes will be opened and the inside plain envelopes with the ballots will be taken out and placed in a separate pile from the outside envelopes which will be shuffled so that all ballots will be kept secret. Then the plain envelopes will be opened and the votes counted.

Results of the election will be announced in the local newspapers, over radio, and TV where available.

FOR MORE INFORMATION

For more information about ASC elections, or about any of the programs of ASCS, call or drop by your ASCS county office. It's your office and you are always welcome.

If you are not satisfied after visiting your ASCS county office, contact your ASC State Committee or a member of your ASC State Advisory Committee on Equal Opportunity. You can reach either through your ASCS State office.

Get the address of your ASCS State office from your county office, or send a postal card for it to your ASCS Administrator, U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. 20250.

Just say: Send me address of my ASCS State office. And give your name and address.

GPO 803-759

PA-774 Revised June 1967

★ GEORGIA NEWS ROUNDUP

FBI Has No Bias, Atlanta Chief Says

ALBANY—Accusations that the FBI is prejudiced on the racial issue are completely untrue, James E. McMahon, special agent in charge of the Atlanta FBI office, said in an address here.

McMahon said local pressure groups have set up a hue and cry for the FBI to intervene in what they term a breakdown in local law enforcement.

No such breakdown has occurred in Georgia, the agent told the Albany Lions Club.

And he branded as gross distortion the accusations of a nationally prominent integration leader, whom he declined to name, that agents turned their back on alleged acts of police brutality.

The person he referred to, the agent said, "has been in your community many times during the past two years." A number of active integration attempts have been made in Albany by outsiders, including Dr. Martin Luther King of Atlanta.

The spokesman he had in mind, McMahon said, has charged that the FBI staffed its Southern offices with pro-segregation agents "who do not agree with the law of the land."

A further accusation was that because of such a situation, the FBI did not probe deeply into reports of alleged police brutality in Albany and elsewhere in the South.

"These allegations were analyzed thoroughly," the special agent said, "and found to be gross distortions and complete untruth."

Don't stay SORE Relieve painful little cuts, burns, scratches, scrapes. Quick, apply hospital-quality Moroline, the first-aid petroleum jelly. Filtered 5 times for extra purity. Saves 40% under next leading brand's 2 oz. jar at 25¢. Same size Moroline is 15¢. Moroline's giant 4⅓ oz. jar gives you over two times more for 25¢. Why pay more? Get the most and best, say "MOROLINE" Petroleum Jelly.

Tobacco Prices Slip Just a Little

VALDOSTA — Most grades of Georgia-Florida flue-cured tobacco Wednesday brought steady to slightly lower prices than Tuesday. The Federal-State Market News Service reported most losses amounted to $1 per hundred pounds and occurred chiefly for lower quality grades.

Columbus Assigns Negro Policeman

COLUMBUS—The city Wednesday assigned its first Negro policeman to duty in five years. At the same time the board of pub-

NATIONAL GUARDIAN
the progressive newsweekly
20 cents
VOL. 17, NO. 36 NEW YORK, JUNE 12, 1965

WRITERS, CONGRESSMEN SPEAK UP

New protests on war policy

By Michael Munk

AS COMMENCEMENT addresses across the nation reflected the Establishment's relief that an academic year of unprecedented protest against its foreign policy had ended, two diverse groups in American society caught the spotlight as, in different ways, they spoke up against the Johnson Administration's actions around the world.

One group consisted of well known American writers and artists, whose individual protests were climaxed June 2 when Pulitzer-prize winning poet Robert Lowell rejected a presidential invitation to attend a White House Arts festival as a protest against what he called Johnson's "explosive" and "chauvinistic" foreign policy—a policy which he said he follows with "dismay and distrust." The next day, 20 other writers and artists, including six other Pulitzer-prize poets, supported Lowell's protest and in a letter to Johnson attacked his "increasingly belligerent and militaristic" foreign policy.

The second group, elected politicians, played their role with the first organized congressional protest against the Vietnam war (also on June 3) as 28 Democratic congressmen called for public hearings on the Administration's policy in Southeast Asia. In a letter to Rep. Thomas Morgan (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, circulated by Benjamin Rosenthal (D-N.Y.), the 28 signers declared that open hearings with the participation of private citizens and government officials would strengthen the "best traditions of democratic practice" by developing "a vigorous and responsible public dialogue about major foreign policy issues." Although the congressmen were careful to avoid any direct criticism on Vietnam, it was clear they were acting in response to the widespread public sentiment against the war.

AS THE BEGINNING of the monsoon season in Vietnam brought fresh evidence that the Saigon army was no match for the NLF's army, and U.S. deaths in the war climbed well over the 600 mark (thus placing the Vietnam war as eighth of the nine U.S. wars in terms of battle deaths, exceeding those in the Spanish-American War), the politicians' request took on special importance.

Among the signers were seven of the 20 Democratic members of the Foreign Affairs Committee and six of the seven House members who voted against the special $700 million appropriations for the Vietnam war. Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) the only member who voted against the appropriation but did not sign the Rosenthal letter, issued her own statement May 26 in which she confessed that she had "searched for every possible excuse to support my government in the policies it is pursuing in Vietnam" but that "there is a point beyond which credibility will simply not stretch—and it is that somehow by waging a wider war we pursue the policy of peace." Mrs. Green

(Continued on Page 9)

DISABLED U.S. PLANE BRINGS UP REAR OF A CONVOY OF CRAFT AT DANANG IN VIETNAM
War protests mount in the U.S. as the bombing of North Vietnam continues

WILSON-ALLEN-NIXON PENALTIES SUSPEN DED; APPEAL DUE

3 sentenced in contempt case

Special to the Guardian
WASHINGTON, D.C.

SUSPENDED SENTENCES of four to 12 months in jail and $100 fine each were given June 4 to peace leaders Mrs. Dagmar Wilson and Mrs. Donna Allen and to GUARDIAN General Manager Russ Nixon following their conviction April 8 of contempt of Congress. Defense Attorney David Rein immediately appealed the conviction. The case raises the issue of the House Un-American Activities Committee's constitutionality and also its right to force witnesses to testify in secret hearings. If necessary, a final appeal to the Supreme Court will be made.

The case involved the refusal of the defendants to testify at closed hearings about their activities in behalf of an entry visa for Japanese peace leader Prof. Kaoru Yasui, who visited the U.S. in November, 1963.

Federal Judge Edward M. Curran, who earlier reached a "guilty" verdict in the case, pronounced the sentences. Citing that the case had raised the issue of secret hearings by HUAC, he held that "neither the court or any private citizen" can tell Congress how to conduct its business. After listening to pre-sentencing statements by the defendants, Curran expressed unhappiness at having to pronounce sentence, and said that he had read the probation reports on Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Allen, and Nixon and that "you are all fine people."

THE FIRST statement of the defendants was made by Nixon (see story Page 8). Mrs. Wilson, founder and leader of Women Strike for Peace, told the court:

"In approaching the State Department to request a visa for Professor Yasui, I was exercising a democratic privilege and carrying out a democratic responsibility. In insisting on a public hearing when questioned by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, I was asserting a democratic right.

"This court has found me guilty of contempt of Congress. My actions, however, far from being contemptuous, are an affirmation of the principle which is fundamental to American life: that of government by consent of the governed. . . .

"If any are contemptible it is those who, like the gentlemen of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, seek to silence the voices of those who have dedicated themselves to meeting the most urgent need of our times—the necessity for nuclear disarmament under international law."

MRS. DONNA ALLEN, who is national legislative chairman of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom and a WSP leader, said:

"I am now a convicted criminal. But I ask why? What kind of criminal am I? Let us and let all Americans consider

(Continued on Page 8)

IN THIS ISSUE

A VIETNAM LETTER
Report to Readers .....p. 2
LATIN AMERICA
Unrest spreads .....p. 3
STRIKES IN THE SOUTH
Negroes on move .....p. 4
THE SANE RALLY
Behind the scenes .....p. 5
ANTI-FASCIST RALLY
The Weimar meeting....p. 6
U.S. AND THE UN
Disaster ahead? .....p. 7

FBI IS INVESTIGATING DISAPPEARANCE OF EIGHT

Mississippi Negro family still missing

By William A. Price

A NEGRO FAMILY of eight whose disappearance three months ago was first reported in the GUARDIAN May 1 is still missing, according to relatives and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Publication of the story provoked an attack on the GUARDIAN and the Negro freedom movement May 7 when the Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission charged that "Communist publications apparently are helping the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party in presenting distortions about Mississippi to get the sympathy of Congress." The Sovereignty Commission's charge, published by the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News under a three-column, front-page headline, was carried in newspapers throughout Mississippi. It said the GUARDIAN story, furnished by MFDP, was a "hoax."

But on May 30, with the family still missing, MFDP asked that "all of the resources of the Justice Department and the FBI be thrown into a nation-wide search" for the family. "Remember that only last year," the MFDP said, "the disappearance of Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner [three civil rights workers whose bodies were later found] was called a hoax by these same papers."

The MFDP demanded retractions by all Mississippi papers "that attempted to spread rumors of a hoax by the MFDP."

THE FAMILY is that of Loron L. Acker, 44, a farm laborer; his wife Zella Mae, and six children who lived in the small rural community of Catahola, Hancock County, Miss. The family's disappearance the day after a March 6 local election about which Acker had expressed strong views, is still a mystery. But a widescale search has been undertaken since publication of the GUARDIAN story. On June 7, an FBI spokesman in Washington told the GUARDIAN that the FBI is conducting an "all-out active investigation." A Department of Justice spokesman said such an investigation was only undertaken when there was a possibility that a federal crime had been committed such as kidnaping or a violation of civil rights statutes. The FBI has listed the

(Continued on Page 4)

FARM WORKERS REBEL IN SOUTH

Wave of strikes by Negroes

A SERIES OF strikes by Mississippi Negro farm laborers who are refusing to work for as little as 30c an hour has broken out in three counties of Western Mississippi which range along the meandering Mississippi River.

The strikes are led by the two-month-old Mississippi Freedom Labor Union organized April 9. They affect Negroes working the rich cotton-bearing land of large white-owned plantations. They have reached into the private province of one of the South's leading segregationists, Sen. James O. Eastland, who owns a huge tract in Sunflower County. They are the first such large-scale opposition to near-feudal conditions since the sharecroppers' strikes were violently suppressed in Mississippi and Alabama in the 1930s, and they have been met with injunctions, evictions, arrests, strikebreakers, and in one case, by gunfire.

The strikes started in April when ten MFLU members refused to work for less than $1.25 an hour in Shaw, Bolivar County. All ten had signed MFLU cards pledging to fight through strikes, collective bargaining and boycotts for a $1.25 minimum wage, an eight-hour day, an end to child labor, sick leave, medical care, equal employment practices and a number of other demands. Since then several hundred Bolivar County Negroes signed the pledge forms and refused to work. About 2,000 have signed similar pledges throughout this section of Mississippi, known as the "delta area."

IN SHAW, 13 strikers, adults and minors, and the Shaw project director for the Conference of Federated Organizations, Mary Sue Gellantley, were arrested and remained in jail until $500 each in bail funds could be raised. Miss Gellantley and several adults were arrested for sitting down to prevent the movement of a truck hearing strikebreakers to a nearby plantation. An arrest warrant has been sworn out for Robert Weil, a Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and COFO worker.

The MFLU was founded at a time when, in Bolivar County, Negroes faced a threatened cut from $3 a day (for a 10-hour and sometimes 12-hour day) for "cotton choppers" to $1.75 a day. A "cotton chopper" is one who hoes weeds between rows of cotton. It is back-breaking "stoop labor," performed usually by the very young and the very old. Children as young as 5 and 6 years old do this work as soon—one civil rights worker says—as "they can hold a hoe."

Other wages fit this pattern. While women and children do the hoeing, the men, usually family heads, work as "hoe bosses" or drive tractors and other mechanized equipment for $5 to $6 a day (for a 12-hour and sometimes 14-hour day). Tractors are equipped with headlights for night work. Overtime is rarely paid.

THE STRIKERS are in two categories, day workers who don't live on the plantations, and tenants who work for wages but live on the plantation in homes—usually unpainted, tin-roofed, frame shacks—provided by the owners or built by themselves.

In Washington County, adjacent to Bolivar, another strike started May 31 when a group of such tenants presented the MFLU demands to A. L. Andrews, the owner of the plantation on which they worked and lived. Here, 12 heads of families—11 tractor drivers and one hoe boss—and about 70 members of their families provide the work force for Andrews' 1,300-acre cotton plantation. The men confronted Andrews with their demands when they went to work at 6 a.m. Andrews replied "I'll go down before I raise you."

The Negro laborers refused to work the plantation which is in Tribbett, 15 miles from Greenville, and formed a picket line outside the plantation gates. On the first day they were able to turn away a busload of other Negro laborers (quickly hired by Andrews) after stopping the bus and explaining the strike to those inside.

THE WORKERS' grievances and demands expose the conditions under which most rural Negroes work. Andrews' retaliation just as clearly reveals how the white power structure maintains its dominance in an area, such as Washington County, where Negroes outnumber whites. Andrews, who formerly taught vocational agriculture, paid prevailing wages and says he recently spent money to improve living conditions of his tenants, said, "I done as much or more for the Nigras in this place as any other place in the Mississippi delta."

SEN. JAMES EASTLAND
Trouble on his plantation

But an hour after the walkout, all utilities to the strikers were cut off and that afternoon, eviction notices were on each door. The notices stated that any striker who returned to his home would be considered a trespasser. The next day, by use of convict labor, all family possessions were taken from the houses and placed on the highway. Some of the furniture, purchased on time payments, was picked up by the credit agencies, so the owners lost their equity. Livestock owned by the strikers had to be slaughtered under emergency conditions when no grazing land was available.

After the first bus load of strikebreakers was turned away, Andrews obtained an injunction limiting the picket line to four persons and picket signs to 30 square inches. Unable to cover the plantation entrances, the strikers could not prevent further strikebreakers from being used the next day. Lawyers of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund have acted to have the injunction lifted and to transfer the case to the Federal District Court in Greenville, which has scheduled a hearing June 16.

ANDREWS declared that he has paid the Negroes' doctors bills, and that "I get my people out of jail, too." What sounds like humanitarianism is actually part of the neo-peonage suffered by Negroes not too far removed from actual slavery. With the judicial system packed against the Negro, it is frequently only the white boss who can get his "boy" out of jail. Having done so, he then has another hold over the Negro's life. During slack winter seasons, the white owner advances money to Negro families for groceries and frequently his workers are therefore perpetually in debt to him and throughout the year may see little of their wages in cash. It is these elements which are part of a system of white rule which control the lives of Negroes long before actual physical violence needs to be invoked.

The MFLU demands confront this system head on, just as the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, from which it sprang, confronts directly the organized white political life in Mississippi.

Behind the strikes is the support of COFO, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the MFDP, and the Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches of Christ, which is providing emergency shelter in Greenville for the families of the Andrews workers.

MFDP leader, Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, speaking to the strikers outside Roosevelt Adams' country store near the Andrews plantation, called the strike "the most important thing that has happened in Mississippi." Workers have wanted to conduct such a strike for a long time, she said, but the Andrews tenants "are the first people to have the guts to do it."

The only violence so far occurred when the wife of the manager of a plantation adjacent to the Andrews tract drove by Adams' store and fired four shots in the direction of one of her workers who had walked off in sympathy. A warrant has been sworn out for her arrest.

MFLU activity has spread to eight delta counties, a COFO-SNCC worker said. On June 3 a busload of 15 Negro workers hired to work in Eastland's Sunflower plantation refused to work when they learned that Eastland would not pay his own tenants after some had registered to vote. The workers walked 25 miles back to Indianola, where they had been hired.

Missing family

(Continued from Page 1)

family as "missing persons."

The family's disappearance was brought to light during an interview sought by this reporter with Mrs. Annie Devine, one of the three Negro women congressional candidates of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party who have challenged the seating of the regular Democratic Party Mississippi congressmen.

The GUARDIAN quoted Mrs. Devine in its May 1 story as saying. "We're used to things like this" as she commented on the fact that during the search for the missing civil rights workers killed near Philadelphia, Miss., last summer, the bodies of two Negroes were discovered in a river.

THE GUARDIAN story said the family had disappeared "without a trace" under circumstances which indicated a hurried departure. When Acker did not apear for work, the story said, a neighbor, Willie Sellers, accompanied by a deputy sheriff, broke into the Acker house. On the kitchen table was a meal, cooked and ready to serve but untouched. The family car was missing and none of the family had heard from Acker.

These facts were subsequently reconfirmed through the MFDP, the family and the FBI, which said the family "left under circumstances which indicated a hurried departure."

In a phone interview May 26, Acker's mother, Mrs. Leola Acker, 79, said in Picayune, Miss., that she had visited her son's home again on May 24 and "I know they're gone, that's all I know." She added that all the family's clothes were still in the house.

The GUARDIAN reported that Acker had expressed opinions about his preferences between two white candidates in an election for beat (a county subdivision) supervisor. Both Loron and his wife were registered voters, his mother said.

LORON'S MOTHER commented that there "must have been some dissatisfac-

Renault in the Frontier, California
"Forgive me for not recognizing y'all, sheriff."

tion about the voting." MFDP stated May 30 that Acker's niece, who lives in Gulfport, said Acker was run out of town "because of how he voted in the election."

Loron's mother said she visited her son's family March 6, the day of the election. She didn't see him, she told the GUARDIAN, but she talked to his wife and saw the children. She said Acker's wife said nothing about going anywhere. They disappeared, apparently that night or the following day, Sunday, March 7.

The Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission stated in its May 7 blast at MFDP and the GUARDIAN that one of its investigators "in only two telephone calls" had learned that the Acker family was visiting relatives in Montgomery, Ala., where one of their daughters had become ill, preventing an early return. Sovereignty Commission director Erle Johnston Jr. said in a subsequent letter to the GUARDIAN that the Commercial Finance Co. of Bay St. Louis had received two money orders from Acker, for payments on his car, on March 31 for $22 and on May 10, for $25. Both were postmarked Montgomery, Ala., and the latter had a return address of "General Delivery, Montgomery, Ala." The first payment included a note, Johnston said, which stated that Acker was staying with a brother in Montgomery.

Acker's mother, however, told the GUARDIAN that he did not know anybody in Montgomery. A Justice Department spokesman told the GUARDIAN May 27 that the FBI was checking the handwriting on the money orders and the note to see if it was Acker's. On June 7, the same spokesman said that the FBI was still trying to check the handwriting, but had not found any specimens of Acker's writing to check against. The FBI refused to comment on whether it had located a brother in Montgomery.

THE SOVEREIGNTY Commission's May 7 statement said that the GUARDIAN, in its May 1 article, "also gave generous space to the MFDP campaign to unseat our duly elected congressman." The commission was set up by the Mississippi Legislature to "protect the sovereignty of the state" and has acted much like a "little HUAC" to expose alleged Communist influence in the civil rights movement.

Ex-FBI spy loses in L.A. vote

By Grace E. Simons
Special to the Guardian

LOS ANGELES

A FORMER anti-Communist undercover FBI informant narrowly missed winning a seat on the seven-member Los Angeles Board of Education in the runoff election May 25.

Victor in the race was the Rev. James Jones, 47, pastor of Westminster Presbyterian Church, who gained a majority of less than 3% in a city-wide election in which 524,125 votes were cast for the office. Jones is the second Negro to be elected to the Los Angeles School Board, and will be the first to sit on the board since Mrs. Ray Allen served two terms, 1939 to 1943.

Jones is an effective speaker and has good educational qualifications. He was chosen as the candidate of the Negro community in a convention sponsored by the United Civil Rights Committee in which 116 groups and organizations participated.

Jones's opponent, Mrs. Marion Miller, a real estate sales agent, came under heavy attack from both Republican and Democrats during the campaign because of her far-right associations. A former spy in Communist ranks, Mrs. Miller denied holding membership in the John Birch Society, but said she had been a speaker at the opening of a John Birch Society book store last December in Canoga Park.

File: FBI

FBI Attitude: Southern?

Negro Editor Cites Case to Support King

MARTIN LUTHER KING
Says Negroes "Discouraged

By Edward Peeks

Southwest Georgia Negroes say the FBI tripped on the rock of racism which made FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover call Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. "the most notorious liar in the country."

In a telephone interview from Albany, Ga., A. C. Searles, editor of the Southwest Georgian, a Negro weekly, summed up the issue this way:

"The FBI director did Dr. King an injustice. If the FBI weren't and aren't controlled by Southerners down here, they act the way we are accustomed to Southerners acting."

Searles said, for example, that FBI agents never questioned him about complaints of civil rights violations in southwest Georgia until a white Albany merchant complained that civil rights pickets forced him to close his supermarket in the Negro community.

FBI agents questioned him, he said, and other Negro community leaders when the white man filed a complaint, but bypassed them when Negroes made scores of charges about police brutality during racial protest demonstrations in 1961, 1962 and 1963.

"It seems odd that the FBI should want to know what I know about one complaint, but nothing about what I know about others," Searles said. "We feel that Mr. Hoover was in error to call Dr. King a notorious liar. If Dr. King said that the FBI was controlled by Southerners, he well could have meant that it operates in a Southern custom toward Negroes."

APPARENTLY, the basis of the FBI director's charge against Dr. King stems from racial strife in southwest Georgia during the summer of 1963 and from an Albany speech made by James E. McMahon, then special agent in charge of the Atlanta FBI office.

McMahon told the Albany Lions Club that a "nationally prominent" Negro leader had made "gross distortions" about alleged acts of police brutality in Albany. McMahon didn't name the leader, but said of the charges:

"These allegations were analyzed thoroughly and were found to be gross distortions and complete untruths."

He said the FBI sought to interview the "nationally prominent spokesman for integration," but agents were told that "he was not available."

McMahon further said, "No organization has a deeper respect for state and local governments or avoids encroaching upon their legal prerogatives more than the FBI. You may check with your own local law enforcement agencies and individuals to determine the validity of that statement."

He added, "I think I know every law enforcement officer in southwest Georgia pretty well, and any number of them will tell you that they are glad that the FBI will investigate these charges of alleged police brutality and not some other agency."

His speech before the Lions was reported in The Albany Herald of Aug. 14, 1963 — a banner story written by Jimmy Robinson, Herald executive editor. The headline said, "FBI Agent Denies Albany Cop Brutality."

Beneath this front page story, an Associated Press story with an Americus, Ga., dateline said, "The Justice Department says it has found nothing to substantiate Negro charges of police brutality during anti segregation demonstrations in this south Georgia city."

This story said that "a Justice Department spokesman said no police action that would warrant federal action was found in an FBI investigation of the complaints."

►

EDITOR SEARLES said he was questioned by the FBI in the case of the white merchant, but not in other cases by Negroes complaining of civil rights violations, including charges of police brutality.

As a result of the merchant's complaint, seven Negroes and a white civil rights worker were convicted last year in Federal District Court on charges ranging from perjury to conspiring "to intimidate a federal juror." Their conviction grew out of a case of alleged police brutality 9n 1961.

The merchant had served as a juror in a suit filed by a Negro against a southwest Georgia sheriff who was accused of pistol-whipping the complainant and shooting him three times in the neck. An all-white jury cleared the sheriff.

In the case of the convicted civil rights workers, they testified in court that the merchant had been picketed, as others had in the Negro community and in downtown Albany, over the issue of job opportunities for Negroes. The defendants denied that they had picketed the merchant because he was a juror who ruled on the police brutality complaint.

Some of the defendants were placed on probation and others were sentenced to the penitentiary. The latter cases are under appeal, including that of Miss Joni Rabinowitz, the white civil rights worker.

Searles, Dr. King and other Negroes noted then and since that the conviction of the Civil rights workers was obtained through intensive investigation by 35 or 40 FBI agents, under the direction of the Justice Department and then-Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy.

A Negro youth in Albany said, "You don't see that many FBI agents around when a white policeman is charged with beating someody's head."

►

DR. KING SAID, "The only instance in which the government has moved with vigor has been against Negro leaders who have been working to removed the evils of the segregation system."

More recently, the Nobel Peace Prize winner referred to these Albany cases and others in replying to the "notorious liar" charge made by FBI Director Hoover.

Dr. King said, "The fact that no arrests have been made in the brutalities in Albany, the murder of the three civil rights workers in Mississippi and the bombing of a church in Birmingham, Ala., has left us all discouraged. This has encouraged individuals of the lunatic fringe to feel that they are aided and abetted by federal agents."

One of the convicted civil rights workers in Albany is a Negro minister, the Rev. Samuel B. Wells. Earlier, he had complained to the FBI that an Albany policeman grabbed him by the genitals and slammed him against the pavement before throwing him in jail during a civil rights protest demonstration. Other Complaints included that of a 16-year-old girl who accused a policeman of taking her by the forelock and shoving her into a jail cell. She said another officer tore off her blouse in the cell and cursed her for lying down on the sidewalk when her group was arrested for protesting racial segregation and discrimination.

In Americus, 37 miles from Albany, a 28-year-old Negro told the FBI that a state trooper broke his leg with a baseball bat. The young man said he was beaten by two troopers who mistook him for a civil rights demonstrator as he was leaving a barbershop.

A 68-year-old pensioner said Americus police beat him and others bloody with billy clubs and cattle prods after a mass meeting at a church. Police intercepted them on their way to city hall to hold a prayer vigil to protest the arrest of civil rights leaders and dem-

J. EDGAR HOOVER
The Rock of Racism

in the head, another six, and another had a broken leg. The actuality of the situation in Americus simply does not confirm the Justice Department's analysis.

"As a resident of the State of New York, I feel that these statements made by Mr. McMahon and the Justice Department will contribute to an undermining of belief in the impartiality and integrity of the United States government, not only in Albany and Americus, but throughout this country as well . . . "

Miss Holtzman referred to C. B. King (no relation to Dr. King), a Negro lawyer in Albany. The lawyer was bludgeoned in 1962 with a cane by a sheriff who was later acquitted in the case by an all-white federal jury.

In a recent discussion of his own case, King said, "FBI agents in Georgia and Mississippi are no different from the local law enforcement officers. They have the same allegiance."

But he said the problem of equal protection and treatment under the law goes beyond this "allegiance" partly dictated by FBI policy of cooperating with local police in civil rights cases and the practice of palling around with them. The problem and its solution rest with the Justice Department and the president, he said.

►

FEDERAL LAWS and constitutional provisions, he said, authorize the attorney general and the president to take action in civil rights cases, including complaints of police brutality.

King said, "The federal government, through the executive branch, has the responsibility to uphold the Constitution of the United States. This language, in my view, gives the president broader powers to do more than has been the case under Mr. Kennedy and under Mr. Johnson."

He criticized the way the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department handled his complaint against the sheriff and complaints of others in the past brought to court on charges of police brutality.

King said, under the federal law which such cases are tried, no grand jury indictment is necessary, but the Civil Rights Division insists on obtaining an indictment before prosecuting the case in court.

He said the law allows the case to be taken directly to court on "mere information" backed by FBI evidence.

"I challenge the failure to prosecute on mere information," King said. "The Jus-cused of pistol-whipping the complainant and shooting him three times in the neck. An all-rights demonstrator as he was leaving a barbershop.

A 68-year-old pensioner said Americus police beat him and others bloody with billy clubs and cattle prods after a mass meeting at a church. Police intercepted them on their way to city hall to hold a prayer vigil to protest the arrest of civil rights leaders and demonstrators.

As Dr. King said, "No arrests have been made in brutalities in Albany," nor in complaints of civil rights violations in Americus and other parts of southwest Georgia during the summer of 1963.

►

THE ALBANY SPEECH by Special Agent McMahon moved Miss Elizabeth Holtzman, a white civil rights worker from New York, to complain to Sen. Jacob Javits, R-N. Y. She mailed copies of her complaint to Atty. Gen. Kennedy and FBI Director Hoover.

Miss Holtzman told Sen. Javits, "I myself saw five shirts stiff with blood that teen-agers in Americus were wearing at the time they were clubbed by the police and burned with electric cattle prods. Reports by C. B. King and his law clerk Dennis Roberts who visited the arrested youths indicate that the teen-agers were beaten so badly that one required 22 stitches

Civil Rights Division insists on obtaining an indictment before prosecuting the case in court.

He said the law allows the case to be taken directly to court on "mere information" backed by FBI evidence.

"I challenge the failure to prosecute on mere information," King said. "The Justice Department and the federal government have an obligation to take advantage of existing laws to see that justice is done."

King takes a legal view of what the rank-and-file Negro, in southwest Georgia and other parts of the Deep South, commonly calls "foot dragging" on the part of the federal government, including the FBI, when it comes to the protection of his constitutional rights.

The rank-and-file Negro believes, rightly or wrongly, that the process of justice slows down to an almost standstill, tied in legal knots fashioned exclusively for him. And the burden of proof in complaints of civil rights violations rests on him, not on the accused police officer or the segregationist bomber.

►

THE NEGRO KNOWS that an arrest is one thing and a conviction is another. It is the duty of the police to arrest on probable cause and it is the obligation of the court to weigh the evidence. He knows that the obligation of the court is not to be confused with the duty of the police, including the FBI.

A shoeshine boy in Albany said, "The FBI is great when it comes to catching bank robbers and Communists, but they ain't nowhere when it comes to catching these people who blow up our civil rights and beat up our heads."

SOMERSET KENTUCKY

A SOCIAL ANALYSIS

prepared by

BUREAU of COMMUNITY SERVICE

KENTUCKY COMMUNITY SERIES NUMBER 2

Sociology Department
College of Arts and Sciences
University of Kentucky
Lexington

March 1951

A COMMUNITY IN TIME OF CRISIS

An Army Camp Reopens in Morganfield, Kentucky

A Report prepared by

BUREAU OF COMMUNITY SERVICE

KENTUCKY COMMUNITY SERIES NUMBER 3

Sociology Department
College of Arts and Sciences
University of Kentucky
Lexington

April 1951

SHELBYVILLE

A Community Social Profile

A Report of Findings

DECEIVED
MAR 17 '52
Southern Regional Council

DECEIVED
Southern

Kentucky Community Series Number 6

Prepared by

BUREAU OF COMMUNITY SERVICE
College of Arts and Sciences
University of Kentucky
Lexington

FEBRUARY, 1952

Mobilizing Kentucky's Resources For Community Development

RECEIVED
MAR 17 1952
Kentucky U
Serials Department

Report of the

First Annual

KENTUCKY HOME TOWN MEETING

Lexington, September 24, 1951

Sponsored by

BUREAU OF COMMUNITY SERVICE

COLLEGE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

University of Kentucky

In cooperation with

AGRICULTURAL AND INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BOARD

And

KENTUCKY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

KENTUCKY COMMUNITY SERIES NO. 5

SOCIOLOGY DEPARTMENT
UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY
LEXINGTON

Preparing A Community Profile:

The Methodology of a Social Reconnaissance

Kentucky Community Series Number 7

Prepared by

BUREAU OF COMMUNITY SERVICE
College of Arts and Sciences
University of Kentucky
Lexington

MAY, 1952

INFORMATION SHEET #1 (Revised 1951)

Bureau of Community Service
University of Kentucky, Lexington

Date:_____
Consultant:_____

Community:_____ 1950 Population:_____ County:_____

Primary Services: (number of each)

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| ____ Groceries | ____ Eating Places | ____ Banks |
| ____ Drugs | ____ Hotels | ____ Bakeries |
| ____ Clothing | ____ Hardware | ____ Loan and/or Ins. |
| ____ Department Stores | ____ Elec.Appliance | ____ Laundry |
| ____ Furniture | ____ Gasoline Stations | ____ Barber-Beauty |
| ____ Auto Sales & Repair | ____ Variety Stores | ____ Frozen Locker |
| ____ Other | ____ | ____ |

Public Service Facilities: (Indicate name of company)

| | |
|---|---|
| _____ Water System | _____ Type of local government |
| _____ Gas System | _____ Size of police force |
| _____ Electric | _____ Fire Department (size and type) |
| _____ Phone System | _____ |
| _____ Sewage System | _____ |
| _____ Garbage disposal | |

Communication, Transportation: (Number of)

| | |
|---|---|
| _____ Telephones | _____ Rail lines |
| _____ Radio Stations | _____ City bus companies |
| _____ Newspapers (Name, political slant) | _____ Inter-city bus lines |
| _____ Post office- city delivery? | _____ Airport |
| _____ Taxi companies | _____ Other |

Education: (Number of white schools within city limits)

| | Public | | Private | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | City | County | City | County |
| Elementary | ____ | ____ | ____ | ____ |
| Junior High | ____ | ____ | ____ | ____ |
| Senior High | ____ | ____ | ____ | ____ |
| Junior College | ____ | ____ | ____ | ____ |
| Four year College | ____ | ____ | ____ | ____ |
| Business School | ____ | ____ | ____ | ____ |

Which of the above are consolidated?

What are the provisions ofr Negro Education? Grade and High School

_____ Library _____Volumes Number of adults in classes_____

Number of Agricultural Extension Agents_____

Number of Teachers:_____ Elementary _____Junior High _____ H.S.

In general how does the school and the community get along?_____

_____

Do the people back the school?_____

Health, Welfare and Professional Services: (Number of)

_____ Doctors _____ Clinics: ____Public ____Private

_____ Dentists _____ Hospitals _____ beds

_____ Trained nurses (Check if there is a local: )

_____ Welfare workers _____ Red Cross

_____ Public Health staff _____ Legal Aid Society

_____ Lawyers _____ Community Chest

_____ Other _____ _____ T.B. Association

_____ Traveler's Aid, Family Service Society, City Welfare department County Welfare Department

Does this community seem to have adequate health services?_____

Leisure time activities and organizations: (Number Of)

_____ Theatres _____ Country club, golf links

_____ Dance facilities _____ Skating rinks

_____ Auditorium (name and number seating) _____

_____ Recreation centers _____ Swimming pool Public_____ Private___

_____ Teen Age Club _____ Playground, Parks

_____ Other Youth Groups Specify _____

_____ Bowling _____ Pool Hall

_____ other _____ other

Do you feel that there are enough activities for everyone in the community? _____

Organizations: Fraternal, Youth, Veterans, Service: (Indicate approximate membership)

_____ Masons _____ American Legion _____ V.F.W.

_____ Odd Fellows _____ Elks _____ Other

_____ Knights of Columbus _____ Other _____

_____ YMCA _____ YWCA _____ Scouts _____4H

Others _____ _____

_____ Rotary _____ Kiwanis _____ Lions

_____ Chamber of Commerce _____ Junior Chamber of Commerce

_____ Business and Professional Women _____ Womans Club

_____ Junior Women's Club _____ Other

_____ P.T.A. _____ Homemakers

_____ Farm Bureau or Grange _____ Community Council

Underline the above organizations which are active in community improvement.

Religion: (Number of churches)

_____ Baptist _____ Presbyterian _____ Negro

_____ Christian _____ Jewish _____ Other

_____ Episcopal _____ Roman Catholic _____

_____ Methodist _____ Nazarene _____ Other

_____ Ministerial Association

Do the churches cooperate with each other?_____

What churches actively contribute to community development?_____

_____

Economics:

_____ Property tax rate _____ School rate

| Industries | Product | Number of Employees Males | Females |
|---|---|---|---|
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |
| | | _____ | _____ |

How is the outlook for business here?_____

_____

Is there economic opportunity for youth?_____

_____

COMMUNITY LEADERSHIP SCHEDULE
This information restricted to use of:
BUREAU of COMMUNITY SERVICE
UNIVERSITY of KENTUCKY

Date_____

Interview by_____

1. Community_____ County_____

2. Informant

Name_____ Age _____ Sex_____

Lived here how long?_____ Elsewhere?_____

Occupation?_____

Residence: In town OR Out of town. Own, Rent, Other_____

Belong to what organizations? (Church, Civic, Business, etc.)

1._____ 2._____

3._____ 4._____

3. What are the different neighborhoods? Describe (Use map if possible).

4. How do the town and farm people get along?_____

Townspeople toward farm people?_____

Farm people toward townspeople?_____

Either group feel superior?_____

Any change in the relationship?_____

5. Leading "community-minded" organizations? (In order of importance)

| ORGANIZATION | ACTIVITIES OR ACCOMPLISHMENTS |
|---|---|
| 1._____ | _____ |
| 2._____ | _____ |
| 3._____ | _____ |
| 4._____ | _____ |
| 5._____ | _____ |
| 6._____ | _____ |
| 7._____ | _____ |
| 8._____ | _____ |

6. Organizations which cooperate with each other? (examples)

7. Organizations which seem to be in conflict with each other?

8. Are there too many organizations in the community? Yes ___ No ___
Explain:

9. Belonging to what organizations give people most prestige?

1._____ 2._____

3._____ 4._____

10. What are the important community events? (dances, parades, drives, etc.)

| | EVENT | SPONSORSHIP | PARTICIPATION |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1. | | | |
| 2. | | | |
| 3. | | | |

11. VALUES: Which of the following are most important to the people of this community? (What gives a man his status?)

- [ ] Church attendance
- [ ] Leading Christian life
- [ ] Location of residence
- [ ] Kind of work one does
- [ ] Individual worth
- [ ] Service to community
- [ ] Length of residence
- [ ] Going far in school
- [ ] Friendliness
- [ ] Wealth
- [ ] Nationality
- [ ] Family background
- [ ] Economic success

Others_____

12. Every community has social layers. How would you describe the layers in this community? How easy is it to move from one layer to another?

13. How loyal are the people to their community? Explain

14. How do the people react to new ideas? Examples.

15. How are newcomers received by the local people?_____

_____How do they seem to adjust to the town?

_____

16. Do you recall any groups or factions in the community which seem to disagree or can't seem to get along? List and explain.

17. Are the people here different from other places in regard to relationships or customs? Yes ___ No ___ (explain)

18. Do the people or organizations here cooperate with those of nearby communities for their mutual benefit?

19. What would you consider the outstanding needs of the community and what organizations should or could tackle them?

| NEED | ORGANIZATION |
|---|---|
| 1._____ | _____ |
| 2._____ | _____ |
| 3._____ | _____ |
| 4._____ | _____ |

20. What do you like best about your community?_____

21. What is your biggest complaint about it?_____

What could or should be done about it?_____

22. Give the names of the eight most outstanding leaders of the community.

| NAME | OCCUPATION | WHY CONSIDERED? |
|---|---|---|
| 1. | | |
| 2. | | |
| 3. | | |
| 4. | | |
| 5. | | |
| 6. | | |
| 7. | | |
| 8. | | |

NOTES AND COMMENTS

KENTUCKY COMMUNITY SERIES

Number 1: Shepherdsville: Honor Community, described in First Biennial Report, Bureau of Community Service, December, 1950, 31 pages (multilithed).

✓ Number 2: Somerset: A Social Analysis, March, 1951, 18 pages (mimeographed).

✓ Number 3: Communities in Time of Crisis: An Army Camp Reopens in Morganfield, Kentucky, April, 1951, 17 pages (multilithed).

Number 4: A Social Profile of Providence, Kentucky, April, 1951, 23 pages (multilithed).

✓ Number 5: Mobilizing Kentucky's Resources for Community Development, Report of the First Annual Kentucky Home Town Meeting, September 24, 1951, 29 pages (multilithed).

✓ Number 6: Shelbyville: A Community Social Profile, February, 1952, 13 pages (multilithed).

Number 7: Preparing a Community Profile: The Methodology of a Social Reconnaissance, May, 1952, 17 pages (multilithed).

Number 8: A Social Profile of Metcalfe County, Kentucky, May, 1952, iv-11 pages (multilithed).

Number 9: Bluegrass Town, Kentucky: An Analysis of Four collective Social Values, June, 1952, 18 pages (multilithed).

Number 10: Paducah: An Embryonic Metropolis, July, 1952, 48 pages (multilithed).

Number 11: Report of Second Annual Kentucky Home Town Meeting, December, 1952 (multilithed).

Number 12: Frankfort: A Community Social Profile, February, 1953, 25 pages (multilithed).

Number 13: As the People See It, Harrodsburg and Mercer County, Kentucky, August, 1953, 40 pages (multilithed).

Number 14: The Search for Recipes for Community Development: A Brief Summary of Community School for a Day, September 28, 1953, 14 pages (multilithed).

BUREAU
of
COMMUNITY SERVICE

UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY
LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY

An agency whose purpose is to help communities help themselves. Should you want its assistance, these are the steps we suggest:

A. Check with a few fellow civic leaders and solicit their support of your ideas of community development.

B. Cooperate with a responsible community group in inviting us to help you explore the problem area.

C. Fill out our Community Fact Sheet to help us make a tentative diagnosis.

We will then help you:

1. Analyze the current social situation.
2. Gauge the possible success of various kinds of programs indicated.
3. Assist your local group in tailoring the selected program to fit your community.
4. Assist in locating technical specialized help wherever needed.

The job is yours, the rewards are yours! Our goal is a better community for you!

BUREAU
of
COMMUNITY SERVICE

UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY

LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY

---

As we have worked to aid X, Y, and Z'ville, Kentucky, we believe we have helped them develop sound plans for action.

Does their situation resemble yours? Can you benefit from their experiences?

---

SOCIOLOGY DEPARTMENT

COLLEGE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

X'VILLE, KENTUCKY

Description:

A bustling, vigorous town of several thousand people. It has 11 churches, 5 women's clubs, 4 men's luncheon clubs, numerous lodges and civic committees. It also has seven faltering, failing community projects. As one citizen says, "Every group has a pet project."

Diagnosis:

Flying apart at the seams from over-organization, lack of co-ordination. The effort is spread too thin!

Prescription:

Consolidation of efforts, merging of projects, and co-ordination of plans. Selling the citizens on the total community welfare, not just some special project.

Y'VILLE, KENTUCKY

Description:

A quiet, friendly temperate town of a few thousand. It has four churches (poor attendance), one women's club (membership confined to a small clique), one men's service club, no youth groups, one small factory, few eligible bachelors, excessive school debt.

Diagnosis:

Suffering mostly from out-migration of young people. No job opportunities. No plan for To-morrow — little interest in To-day!

Prescription:

We are assisting a local citizen group in planning for the use of local agricultural resources to develop new business for job opportunities to "bring the boys back home" and at the same time benefit the whole community.

Z'VILLE, KENTUCKY

Description:

An important county seat; forty civic-minded organizations that one man says "have never been able to accomplish anything." It is economically healthy only for a few. It has problems in the fields of health, education, traffic regulations, and government. Several young men express "The itch to move on." They say, "Folks here regard new ideas as bad ideas."

Diagnosis:

No provision has ever been made to transfer leadership from the older leaders to the rising generation.

Prescription:

We are counseling with a younger age group of citizens to help them demonstrate leadership and prove capable of responsibility in the years to come.

YOUR TOWN

—Can you portray it?

Description:

Diagnosis:

Prescription: